Havensville, Kansas.—"Inclosed find order for $20.00 for Home Missions. This is a free will offering, and the largest missionary collection ever taken here."—W. M. MAYFIELD.

Brazil, Ind. — "Find inclosed $4.96. Last year the church gave nothing for Home Missions."—PERRY T. MARTIN.

Lawrenceburg, Ind.—"I inclose herewith $9.00 for Home Missions. We are rejoicing. Last year we sent in only $1.25."—WILL G. LOUCKS.

Corunna, Ind.—"This year we have raised, I believe, the largest offering that has ever been raised at this place for Home Missions."—JOHN J. HIGGS.

Olathe, Kansas.—"More than reached the apportionment."—C. H. HILTON.

Shreveport, La.—"Our offering goes slightly beyond apportionment." — CLAUDE L. JONES.

Haverhill, Mass.—"Every one is pleased to know that we have made the largest offering we have ever made to the home work."—E. M. FLINN.

Flora, Indiana.—"The Flora Church more than doubled the offering of last year for Home Missions."—J. C. ANDERSON.

Redwood Falls, Minn.—"We shall continue the offering next Lord's day. We raised, however, $15.45 as against $6.37 last year. Hope to raise four times the six dollars."—H. GOODACRE.

Birmingham, Ala.—"Took our offering, and will send in as soon as we gather up the fragments."—O. P. SPIEGEL.

Paris, Mo.—"We took our offering for Home Missions Sunday, and raised over our apportionment."—W. N. BRINEY.

Children's Day.

Children's Day for Heathen Missions is the first Sunday in June. The time is at hand. Order Missionary Pockets, Children's Day Exercises and the Children's Day number of the Missionary Voice, if you have not already done so. They are all furnished free of charge. Give the number in your school and proper supplies will be furnished upon request.

Last year, 3,180 schools observed Children's Day. We are expectlng a much larger number this year. The schools are asked for $40,000. Last year they gave over $34,000. They have given almost $300,000 since 1881.

There is a larger force of missionaries this year than last. We must press forward in the harvest field of the whole world. Let active preparation begin now.

Continue the Offering for Home Missions.

The rain, which was so widespread over the area from which the offering comes, affected it adversely. From seventy-five churches we have postals stating that on account of the rain the offering will be taken next Sunday, and we have telegrams and letters reporting thousands of dollars taken in pledges in the various churches.

Only 137 churches have remitted, and 69 of these are churches not remitting last year. There is encouragement in all this for all who believe in American missions to work with a will for the $100,000 for the Jubilee Year.

Wherever the offering was taken, and was hindered by the rain, the church should continue it next Lord's day, and the churches not taking it should make a special effort so we may not suffer on account of the rain which was general over the country. Letters and postals and telegrams from all over the country indicate that the preachers are standing loyally by the work. We have the right of way all through May. A strong pull altogether and we are all right for the Jubilee offering.

For Home Missions.

BLUEFIELD, W. VA.

BENJ. L. SMITH—DEAR BROTHER: Our Jubilee offering for Home Missions on last Sunday reached $105.00. You will find bank draft inclosed for same, which please give credit the Bluefield Church. This is the first time our congregation has observed the Home Mission day and this is our first offering as a church.

If you want my name as one who gave and expects to continue to give every year as much as ten dollars, just put it on your books.

Respectfully, J. F. STONE.

The above letter explains itself. This church was apportioned $25.00, and they asked that this be reduced to $15.00 which was done. The $105.00 shows what may be done when a special effort is made. What a mighty power for God is wrapped up in our people when it is developed. BENJ. L. SMITH, C. C. SMITH, } Cor. Secs.

Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, O.

EDWARDS, MISSISSIPPI.

B. L. SMITH—DEAR BROTHER: Inclosed you will find $1.00, the offering from Mt. Beulah Plantation Sunday-school. The school is composed of young colored children of this and neighboring plantations. They are so poor that many cannot attend in cold weather on account of lack of shoes and clothing, so the offering is a large one for them.

Yours sincerely, JAS. S. COMPTON.

Home Mission Offering.

The following is the comparative statement of receipts to the American Christian Missionary Society for the first week of the offering for the years 1898 and 1899:

The number of new churches contributing is 88 and the number contributing an increase amnout is 59.

Reports indicate the rain was general over the United States and hence delayed the offering. We believe it was only delayed. The friends of Home Missions will rally to its support as never before and continue the collection next Lord's day. The preachers over the country will not allow one rainy Lord's day to permanently injure our Jubilee offering.

Salt Lake City, May 8.—Five added by letter yesterday.—W. H. BAGBY.

ARKANSAS.

Hebron, May 10.—Last Lord's day I closed a meeting of eight days at Arkadelphia with four added to the church.—E. S. ALLHANDS.

WASHINGTON.

Everett, May 8.—J. S. McCallum, of Olympia, closed a three weeks' meeting with us last night, resulting in seven additions. Our outlook was never more hopeful.—JOHN YOUNG.

OREGON.

La Grande, May 9.—I close my second year's work as pastor here next Lord's day. We go from here to The Dalles, Oregon, where I have accepted the pastorate of the Christian Church. —GENTRY RUSHING.

IOWA.

Bedford, May 9.—The Bedford Church raised its apportionment ($20) for Home Missions last Lord's day. It has more than met all apportionments. Considering we are endeavoring to build a $7,000 house, I think the church has done well.—J. WILL WALTERS.

IDAHO.

Payette, May 8.—Our meeting here is progressing nicely. We now have a membership of forty. We expect to organize the church, a Ladies' Aid Society and a Bible-school this week. The meeting will in all probability close within another week or two, after which we shall return to Iowa.—LAWRENCE WRIGHT.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Huntington, May 4.—Closed a meeting at Sciotoville, O., with 19 added. The congregation has hitherto been working upon the independent missionary plan, supporting a missionary in the Island of Cyprus, but will hereafter take part in world-wide missions. Will take all the collections.—A. E. ZEIGLER.

TENNESSEE.

Jonesboro, May 8.—Our meeting is progressing splendidly. Large audiences and eight additions to date.—J. L. HADDOCK.

Springfied, May 11. — Bro. E. Lynwood Crystal, of Dyersburg, Tenn., closed a meeting with us last night. The results were 12 additions and the church greatly strengthened. I will begin a meeting with Bro. Crystal at Dyersburg next Lord's day.—LOUIS D. RIDDELL.

INDIANA.

Columbus, May 10.—Closed a 10 days' meeting at Ogleville, with 13 added. — EUGENE MARTIN, evangelist.

Irvington, May 11. — Closed two weeks' meeting at William's Creek Church, Marion County, with 31 additions; 30 by baptism.—J. F. FINDLEY.

Bedford, May 15 (Special Telegram).—Our meeting continues, with 200 additions to date. James Small is the evangelist. — JOSEPH FRANKLIN.

KANSAS.

Mound Valley, May 10.—Our work here is moving off very encouragingly. The outlook is bright and hopeful. We hope for a great work and much good to be accomplished here the coming year. We had a good meeting with the church at Island fifth Sunday in April. Two were baptized in the name of Jesus. The church at Island is in a prosperous condition.—J. P. HANER.

Smith Centre, May 8.—Four confessions at Custer schoolhouse March 30. Four confessions at Kensington April 12, and two weeks' meeting closed at Smith Centre, May 3, with six confessions and four by letter and statement.—A. L. DRUMMOND.

OHIO.

McGuffey, May 7.—Two additions since last report.—D. F. HARRIS.

Portsmouth, May 12.—J. V. Updike closed his meeting at Ironton, on the 7th inst., with 127 added to the church.—J. F. DAVIS.

Columbus, May 8.—Central Church reports three added; one baptism and two by letter. In fifteen months since coming to Columbus 120 have been added under our labors; 60 at home and 60 abroad.—R. W. ABBERLEY.

Ada, May 8.—Two confessions yesterday. Yesterday I closed my work with the church here to accept a call to the Ætna St. Church, of Cleveland, O. During my 21 months' ministry have had 162 additions, 111 of which were here, and the remainder elsewhere. The large normal school here makes this a fruitful field. Prof. Park teaches a students' class with an average attendance of 300.—AUSTIN HUNTER.

Christian S. S. Literature

WHY USE IT?

For the same reason that Christian Churches employ Christian preachers. Preachers are instructors, but not more so than the literature placed in the hands of the children. If first impressions are most lasting, would it not be safer to put sectarian preachers in our pulpits than sectarian literature in our Sunday-schools?

Sunday-school instruction should be in harmony with the teaching of the Bible. The literature published by the Christian Publishing Company is sound to the core, and proclaims the Old Jerusalem Gospel in all its simplicity and purity.

Goodnight—God Bless You!

BY ARTHUR O. GARRISON.

Into my arms my baby springs,
  Clad in her gown of white;
Close to my breast she snugly clings,
Prattling away of all sorts of things,
  E'er she's ready to say goodnight.

"I've been real good this whole long day.
  Did I cry any? Let—me—see:
O yes, just once: I wanted to play
With your razor, and mamma said, 'No'—and, say!
  Have you got any candy for me?"

When our chat is done and it's time to go
  To her nest in her snowy bed,
She clasps me closer, and whispers low:
"Goodnight—God bless you: I love you so!"
  And the last goodnight is said.

If you have a darling who fills your heart
  As mine fills mine, I guess you
Know just how I feel when she holds me tight,
Pressing my lips with kisses light,
  And says: "Goodnight—God bless you!"

THE EVOLUTION OF A PASTOR; Or, Elder Bruce's Experiences at Eastville.

BY A. A. HONEYWELL.

CHAPTER IV.

Elder Brune.—Let us begin with the Acts of the Apostles. Bro. Olds, will you please read the eleventh chapter and last two verses?

Bro. Olds.—"Then the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea, which they did and sent it to the elders by the hands of Barnabas and Saul." How long was this after Pentecost?

Elder Brune.—The famine referred to here doubtless began in the fourth year of the reign of Clandius Cæsar (A. D. 44) and lasted four years. It seemed to have fallen exclusively upon Judea (according to Josephus) and was very severe. That would make it, perhaps, thirteen or fourteen years after Pentecost, if Pentecost was 33 A. D. as Usher gives it.

Bro. Olds.—The church seems to have been officered with elders at that time.

Bro. Brown.—They were also evidently men of importance and took precedence over the deacons, else the donations would have been given them instead of the elders.

Elder Brune.—Let us look farther before discussing the subject; we may find additional light. Acts 14:23 reads as follows: "And when they had ordained them elders in every church and prayed with fasting they commended them to the Lord on whom they believed." The revised version reads, "Appointed for them elders" instead of ordained them elders.

Bro. Brown.—The Apostle Matthias was chosen by lot (Acts 1:26), the deacons were chosen by the people (Acts 6:5), but these elders seem to have been appointed by the apostles.

Elder Brune.—Even if the apostles did appoint them, it does not necessarily follow that the church had no voice in the matter of their selection. The deacons were selected by the people, but were appointed by the apostles. May not this same plan have been followed in this case?

Bro. Olds.—I think it altogether probable that such was the case. I notice also that "elders were appointed in every church"—not an elder in each church.

Elder Brune.—That is a very important observation, as we shall see before we are through.

Bro. Brown.—I will read Acts 15:4 according to the revised version, as I have them both here in parallel columns: "And when they came to Jerusalem they were received of the church, the apostles and the elders, and they rehearsed all things that God had done with them."

Elder Brune.—The "they" referred to here were Paul and Barnabas who had been appointed by the brethren of Antioch to attend a conference at Jerusalem to decide whether the Gentiles must keep the law of Moses or not, especially pertaining to circumcision.

Bro. Olds.—Acts 15:4 reads: "And as they went through the cities they delivered them the decrees for to keep, that were ordained of the apostles and elders which were at Jerusalem." Why should the elders at Jerusalem sign the decrees? Were not the names of the apostles sufficient?

Bro. Brown.—This is further evidence that they were men of importance whose authority was recognized even by the Gentiles.

Elder Brune.—What Bro. Brown says is, I think, true and being elders of the mother church gave their decrees special weight, especially so because those who were stirring up the Gentile Christians claimed to voice the sentiment of the church at Jerusalem. I will read Acts 20:17: "And from Miletus he sent to Ephesus and called the elders of the church."

Bro. Olds.—There were elders of the church at Ephesus as well as at Jerusalem, and I notice in the twenty-eighth verse of the same chapter that they are called overseers.

Bro. Brown.—I notice also that they were made such by the Holy Spirit and were told to "take heed to all the flock" and to "feed the church of God." Would this not indicate that they were men in authority?

Elder Brune.—I think they were to exercise an oversight over the church as a shepherd tends his flock, but not as a master over slaves.

Bro. Olds.—There was, of course, a limit to their authority. I think we can all agree on that point, and as it is getting late, I suggest that we defer further investigation until to-morrow night or during as many evenings as is required. I must confess I have become quite interested in this study and as an elder of this church wish to more clearly understand my duties and obligations.

Bro. Brown.—Yes, the subject has an interest I did not know it possessed. I never have taken much interest in the subject before.

Elder Brune.—It has an unusual interest to me and I am pleased to know it has proven so to you also. Let us not forget in our petitions to pray that our eyes may be opened and our understandings quickened that we may rightly understand the Master's will in this matter. I am sure we all wish to conform to his will. Goodnight, brethren.

Bro. Brown.—Good-night, Bro. Brune; call at the store in the morning, we have some work laid out for to-morrow that is quite urgent.

Bro. Olds.—Good-night.

Elder Brune.—Good-night. I will expect you both to-morrow evening.

"Bro. Brune seems to persist that we have no right to tell him what he should do," remarked Bro. Brown as they left the parsonage, "but the Scriptures do not seem to sustain him—at least so far as we have gone. The Jewish elders had authority, the elders at Jerusalem signed degrees with the apostles and the Ephesian elders were overseers of the church."

"I don't wish to be disrespectful to Bro. Brune, I presume he is honest in his opinion," replied Bro. Olds, "but I don't like to see a man above his station. When I hire a man to work for me, I expect him to do what I want him to do, and not to have him give me directions. Bro. Brune don't like to be considered a hired man, but if the church hasn't hired him and he therefore an employee I don't know what he is. He seems to think he should have the directing and governing of the church conferred upon him."

"Too true," added Bro. Brown. "He does not seem to appreciate our leniency. Here is the janitor work which he could do just as well as not, but which we hire done, and while we are paying out money to have the wood sawed for the church we might just as well have him put in his spare time that way; besides, 'twould do him good."

"I notice, also," said Bro. Olds, "that he thinks we ought to pay him special deference. I noticed the other day when I told him to shovel paths about the church (you remember how the snow drifted in front of the church) that his eyes snapped and he drew up his shoulders as if he considered such work beneath him, but he only said "all right." I noticed, however, that he got Widow Jones' oldest boy to do it for him.

Well, here we are at my gate. You better come in a few moments?"

"No, thank you, it is too late," replied Bro. Brown, "but I think after this investigation is over and he is convinced of our authority, that we had better save that four dollars a month and have him to do the janitor work, or if he objects he can resign. Don't you think so?" "Yes, indeed, I have thought so, and so has Mrs. Olds, for a long time." "Good-night."

"Good-night."

The Man with the Hoe.

BY MARY PENDLETON KEMPER.

"In the sweat of thy brow" thou thy bread shalt consume.
Whose fiat was uttered thus?—say!
And who was the Judge that determined the doom
Of the "banished from Eden" that day?

Who decreed that the thorn and the thistle should grow
Where the flowers of Paradise bloomed?
Who laid on the back of the "man with the hoe"
This burden to bear to the tomb?

'Twas Jehovah, and hath not the Potter the power
To fashion the clay as he will?
Can man, feeble man, but the sport of an hour,
Can he say to his Maker, "Be still!"

In the fullness of time, as his purposes will,
He will make all his Providence plain,
And the "man with the hoe" his decrees may fulfill,
Yet the glories of Heaven attain.

Music in Education.

If we are to consider the value of music in education we must, first of all, make very clear what is meant by education. We mean something more than mere knowledge of books and subjects. There is something in all human beings which is of vastly more importance than the intellect alone. By education we mean a development, an unfolding, a growth of the whole nature, physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual. Nature instructs by using all our faculties; we can easily discern this, if we watch her methods carefully.

It seems to many persons that the education of the schools consists largely in the training of the memory. We admit that more attention is being paid, nowadays, to the perceptive organs, and also to the reflective. Children are being taught to think and to consider more; also, to some slight extent, there is a cultivation of the imagination; but education is not yet the high art which it is destined to become.

The influence and power of music as an educator is being felt more and more; but we are only beginning to realize the power it will eventually become as an educator, or developer, of all that is highest and best in mankind.

In times past it was thought that the imagination should be repressed, but we of the present day are coming to realize that the imagination is a God-given faculty and possessed by all men. That it may be abused we, of course, admit; but in admitting this we realize the more the importance attaching to its proper development, and the necessity for careful training of this gift. Imagination is the ideal faculty, the poetic side of man. It is from the soul that the true musician touches us; therefore it is of the first importance, in musical training, that this quality which we call musical soul shall be developed in all students. Some of the ways by which this can be done are by helping to arouse beautiful thoughts; by carefully cultivating a sensitive, true feeling; in a word, by fostering all that pertains to nobility of character or soul. Rev. Dr. Collier once said, in speaking of music as an influence, or "means of grace:" "Music is the unfallen angel of the world; she has never taken a taint of the sin which has smitten every other thing we touch. Poetry, painting, philosophy, faith, hope, charity, prayer—you can find the trail of the serpent over them all; but before you can make an evil or even a doubtful thing of music you must blend with it some evil element and so drag it down. To hear good music is always, for that reason, a means of grace, and to make good music is a gracious thing. . . . . There is no such thing as profane music; there is only one kind—it is sacred music.—New England Conservatory Magazine.

A True Story.

BY MISS LIZZIE DEUPREE.

In 1812 Minerva Allen, a little girl of six years, came from Tennessee to Indiana with her fosterparents, Eld. James Smith and wife.

They lived in a block house with other families until the war of 1812 was over, and they thought that they would be safe from the Indians. Then they went to live in their own houses.

After they were well settled in their new home, while Minerva was still quite young, one bright day in early autumn, Eld. Smith and wife went away to spend several days. They left Minerva and another little girl about her age alone to keep house.

The girl was Jane Oldham. After Minerva and Jane had finished their evening work, they roasted potatoes in the ashes in the old-fashioned fireplace.

While they were thus engaged they heard a tap at the door. The girls looked in each others frightened faces. But as the tap came again they had to go to the door to see what was wanted. When they opened the door there was a big Indian sitting on his pony and a tomahawk in his hand.

The girls were white with terror, for they did not know but what he might want their scalps. But he only asked for salt. Minerva hastened to comply with his request, and as she gave it to him, he said, "Good squaw," then rode away.

The girls were glad to be left alone again and turned once more to roasting potatoes. They were not troubled again, and when Eld. Smith and wife returned they found the girls all right and everything in good order.

This story was told by Minerva to her granddaughter some sixty years afterward. Eld. Smith was an uncle of Eld. James Conner, one of our pioneer preachers.

Not Observant.

The old man in the shaggy overcoat mentioned something about Kansas in his talk, and the Bostonian leaned over toward him and asked:

"Did you say you were from Kansas?"

"No; but I jest come from there."

"Then I want to ask you a few questions. How are times out that way?"

"I dunno."

"Is money plenty or tight?"

"Can't say."

"But don't you know how the farmers are feeling?"

"No."

"Is business good or bad in the towns?"

"I didn't ask anybody."

"You—are not an observing man," said the Bostonian.

"No, I guess not. I went out to Kansas to see a widder I used to know, and to ask her to marry me. I got to her house at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. I asked her to have me, and she said she wouldn't, and at 3:30 I was on my way back. I didn't see no crops, nor ask about good times or bad. The state of Kansas may be holdin' a reg'lar Fourth of July over good times, or everybody may be goin' to the poorhouse. All I know about it is that I'm an old fool for spendin' $60 to run arter a Kansas widder when I could hev married a New Hampshire gal for 12 shillins!"—Chicago News.

An Ancient Inscription.

In the ancient cathedral of Lubeck, in Germany, there is an old slab with the following inscription:

"Thus speaketh Christ our Lord to us:
Ye call me Master, and obey me not;
Ye call me Light, and see me not;
Ye call me Way, and walk me not;
Ye call me Life, and desire me not;
Ye call me Wise, and follow me not.
Ye call me Fair, and love me not;
Ye call me Rich, and ask me not;
Ye call me Eternal, and seek me not;
Ye call me Gracious, and trust me not;
Ye call me Noble, and serve me not;
Ye call me Mighty, and honor me not;
Ye call me Just, and fear me not;
If I condemn you, blame me not."

A Faithful Boy.

There is a good suggestion for American boys in this story, which appeared recently in Forward:

A little messenger boy in London showed such unusual ability and faithfulness in his daily work this winter that one of his employers wagered that he could cross the Atlantic alone, carry letters to New York, Philadelphia and Chicago, deliver them, and returning on the same ship, bring the answers back to London, with no other instructions than those given him at starting. So prompt, his employer contended he would be that he would beat the trans-Atlantic mails.

The wager was taken, and early the next morning the little lad, who was but thirteen and who never before had been out of London, started for Southampton and boarded the St. Louis, bound for America. He arrived in New York, and immediately after landing had delivered his first letter and taken a receipt for it. He was a picturesque figure in his uniform and with his hat on one side of his head. In two hours he left New York for Chicago, where he delivered his letter and started to return the same day. He accomplished his errand in Philadelphia, and reached New York in time to go home on the St. Louis.

The oddity of his errand attracted attention, and American messenger boys and reporters waited for him at every turn. But there was something more in the boy and in his success—something worth the notice of every lad who, too, hopes to succeed in life.

Little Jaggers had a clear head and quick perceptions, but he was not in the least "smart" or sharp or pushing. He was a modest, gentle lad, extremely courteous, with a low, quiet voice, answering every kindness with a delighted laugh; but he kept to his duty as loyally as any soldier who won the Victoria cross.

Another secret of his success and of the favor he received was his lack of vanity and his calmness. He did not hurry or swagger, but went on quietly about his business. The third secret was his politeness. The American messenger boys were quite astonished when he stood at attention and touched his cap when he was addressed. But in consequence of these qualities no one met the little English boy who did not become his friend, and try to do something to make his task easy. Difficulties vanished before him.

"I have had much kindness shown to me," he said, "and many happy sayings have been spoken to me. My mother will be glad to hear them."

WASHING DISHES

A mountain of dishes confronts the average housewife after all the family have dined. They are greasy dishes, too, and hard to get clean with soap and water. The best, easiest, quickest and cheapest way to wash dishes is to use a little in the dish-water. It acts like magic, cuts the grease and makes the dishes perfectly clean. In fact all cleaning is made easier by this great cleanser, and at half the cost of soap.

GOLD DUST

An Evasive Creditor.

The Ameer of Afghanistan must be rather trying in the character of debtor. Mr. Frank Martin is at present in Cabul endeavoring to collect a debt amounting to nearly £20,000, owing to his firm by the Ameer's government. But his prospects are not bright. The Ameer's methods are thus described: "He feeds every official and houses him, and gives him an occasional rupee or so, but pay him his full remuneration he will not. He proffers no rude refusal to a request for coin. His method belongs to the 'suaviter in modo' style throughout. 'My friend,' he exclaims, 'what is mine is yours. Take anything you want. Have they not fed you properly? Do you want more furniture or clothes? Do you want something else to drink? Is there anything I have got that you want, and can think of? If so, take it, my friend, take it to your house.'" Rupees, however, his highness can never be persuaded to part with. He will send them by and by; he will send them at once. His friends may take lakhs for the mere asking. But the friend asks, and asks, asks again, and withal gets never a lakh.' Since it is quite impossible to sue an Ameer, the lot of the poor creditor is not a desirable one. —St. James Gazette.

In the midst of a dinner given once by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to a well-known Archbishop of Dublin, the company was startled by seeing the Archbishop rise from his seat, pale and agitated, crying: "It has come, it has come!"

"What has come, your grace?" eagerly inquired a half-dozen voices from different parts of the table.

"What I have been expecting for years, a stroke of paralysis," solemnly answered the Archbishop; "I have been pinching myself for the last ten minutes and find my leg entirely without sensation."

"Pardon me, my dear Archbishop," said the host, looking up to him with a quizzical smile; "pardon me, but it is my leg you have been pinching."

An Angel on a Box.

Jennie, Mildred and Miss Harriet sat in chairs along the wall watching the little group at the table, while the robber stood in the doorway, grinning at Delight. Fup was close beside the little orphan and watched with absorbing interest every bite that was lifted to her mouth. Delight tried not to look at him, for whenever she did the dog began to beat the floor with his tail so loud that it seriously interrupted the conversation.

"First," said Mr. Weston, "I will tell the cause of our suddenly going to St. Louis. You may not know that brother Henry had all his property in land last year and as he wished to make a deal in St. Louis, I went his security for $20,000 which, by the way, is just about the extreme limit of what I own. But I never dreamed of having to pay it, because brother Henry is so sure and steady and his land was good; and while I wouldn't take a mortgage, because we trust each other as we do ourselves, and besides, he went security for me, once—"

"Do you mean to say," cried Miss Harriet, who had tured very pale, "that cousin Henry has failed?"

"I don't mean to spoil my story by telling how it turns out before it begins," said Mr. Weston, taking another piece of ham. "Well, here came a telegram from St. Louis from brother Henry, telling me to come instantly, that all was over, or something like that. We didn't know what it meant. So your mother and I left, as you know, very much troubled. We got to St. Louis. I left your mother in the waiting room while I went for a carriage, and it was there that she met Delight. Delight, suppose you tell how you happened to be there."

"Before you say another word," said Miss Harriet, firmly, "I must know if Cousin Henry is ruined, and if you are liable for all that money."

"Go on, Delight," said Mr. Weston.

"You see," said Delight, who was feeding herself with a knife as if she were a can and the knife a can-opener, "I was taking my basket up and down the street that morning, ever so early, but nobody would give me anything, and I was so, so cold. And of a sudden a front door opened where a carriage was standing, and a lady came out dressed like an angel, only she had on ever so much more clothes, and they was two men with her. And the lady was getting in with one of the men lifting up her shoulder, 'cause I guess she was sick and couldn't get in by herself, when a man came along with a cane. And the man said, 'Where was she off to?' And the lady said, 'This time she was going to Washington.' And the man said 'bond voy,' or something like that. As soon as I knew she was going to Washington I knew I had a chance at last of seeing Washington, so I follered, running like anything, till we come to the great big depot. And I follered and follered till she sat down on a seat and I came up and said, 'Was she sure enough going to Washington?' So she said, 'What a dirty little girl was I?' And I said, 'Washington was dirty, too, but he loved me and I loved him more than a city full.'"

"Sakes alive!" ejaculated the robber.

"I was sitting close by," said Mrs. Weston, now taking up the story, "and I called Delight to me and began to question her. And the more she talked the more I was drawn to her. When Mr. Weston came back she told him so much about 'Wash,' that it suddenly struck us she might mean you, Mr. Shaw. The names were the same. So Mr. Weston sent the telegram about you. Then we went straight to Brother Henry's house, taking Delight with us, but we didn't know what we would do about her."

"But I had already made up my mind," said Delight, "that I was coming home with them."

"Brother Henry met us with a dismal face, and no wonder," said Mr. Weston. "He had sold that land in Kansas, realizing about $15,000. His St. Louis deal was to have been finished the next day. He cashed his checks and took the money home, all of it. A very foolish thing, no doubt; but one bank had broken that morning, and when one bank breaks you think all the rest are cracked, at least. He was uneasy over having so much money in the house that night. He had a certain paper box, with the picture of an angel on it, flying. He took the notion to put his money in that box, between the blank paper. He thought the jewel case too risky, though he could have locked that. Well, the next morning when he got up the house had been robbed. Paper box was gone. So was his watch, etc. He sent for the police. A detective was employed. A few days passed; no prospect of recovering his money. He saw himself ruined—and me, into the bargain! So he telegraphed for me—"

"Cousin!" cried Miss Harriet, "how can you be calm about this terrible mifortune?"

"You wait," returned Mr. Weston.

"I can't wait!" declared Miss Harriet.

(Mrs. Weston turned to her—"It all came out all right.")

"Oh, then somebody found the box?"

"You listen to me," Mr. Weston demanded. "While Bro. Henry was telling all this, Delight was sitting in the room, listening very hard. I was just about to collapse over the news, and your mother had already collapsed, when up spoke the orphan. She said, 'I expect I know where that box is!'"

"Yes," said Delight, "while they were telling about the box it was like pins sticking all over into me, I was so glad. I had saw that box at our place, and Bidgy—he's the man that beats me—said the woman with the wings was an angel. Wings was all she had on, too, except a scarf, but it didn't do no good, because it streamed off in the air, 'cause her wing made the wind to be blowing."

"Here was a clue," said Mr. Weston. "We went to that wretched place—a filthy room in a tenement house—and there was the man and the box, for he hadn't found out that there were bank-notes between the sheets of paper. He had just taken the box because it was in sight. But there was no sign of the watch or other valuables. So the man is in jail, and his wife—a horrible looking woman—has escaped, no doubt with the things, and here is Delight, the heroine of the story, who has saved us all from ruin."

There was a general chorus of admiration, and all would have rushed upon Delight to kiss her, but she looked particularly dangerous at that moment with her knife tightly clutched in her hand. Mr. Weston continued: "We found out that these people had stolen Delight from Washington Shaw, and Mr. Shaw had stolen her from her home. We took her back there, but the lady who had married her father would not receive her, and as she has no relations, as far as we could discover, here she must stay. She says she wants to stay, and that she loves your mother better than anybody else."

"Yes," said Delight. "But that was before I knew Wash was here."

"With the exception, of course, of Mr. Shaw," said Mr. Weston.

"And Fup," added Delight."

"You little darling," cried Mildred, catching her up and marching with her across the room, "you must learn to love me just as well as Fup, because I am an orphan too, and my mother is an angel just like the picture you saw."

"Is she on a paper box?" asked Delight.

"No, dear; she is in heaven, of course."

"Then heaven must be a mighty warm place," said the child.

The next morning Miss Harriet and Mildred returned to their own home. Mr. and Mrs. Weston were presented with the back numbers of the Daily Gleaner, in which they read the news of all that had happened during their absence. It was not long before Delight grew used to the family, and Jennie found her a delightful companion, though disposed to ask a good many questions. Of course, there were times when Jennie would rather have been reading than answering; but she was willing to sacrifice a little of her own pleasure to make the little one happy.

One evening George and Jennie received this message: "The Advance Society is called to meet Saturday afternoon, 3 P. M., at the home of Horace Blount. Will have regular program, then discuss a great entertainment scheme. TONY STUBBS, Sec."

THE JEWISH TRIBUNAL.*

Out of the gloom of Gethsemane, amid the glare of torches borne by temple guards, Jesus was led to the palace of Annas or Hanan, the deposed high priest, who was still regarded as the head of the Jewish Church by the people. He had been displaced by Roman authority, but the office was given successively to his sons and his son-in-law, Joseph Caiaphas, and Annas really held the power of his position as much as ever. Caiaphas appeared on high occasions to discharge the functions of the pontificate, but his father-in-law was the real pontiff. It was before him accordingly that Jesus was led for his preliminary hearing, whose results the formal meeting of the council or Sanhedrin would ratify at daybreak. This night meeting was illegal, but that did not deter the Jewish leaders from hastening all preparations for their anticipated triumph to-morrow over their enemy, the teacher from Galilee.

When Jesus was arrested, the disciples had made their escape, perhaps through a sense of peril to themselves, and perhaps in obedience to Jesus' hint to them in his request to the guards, "If ye seek me, let these go their way." Only three of them, Peter, James and John, were near him at the moment of his seizure, and the rest who waited at the entrance to the garden could easily avoid notice.

But Peter and John, the latter of whom refers to himself, as usual, as "the other disciple," were not content to leave Jesus to his fate and followed the band of men, the light of whose torches marked their march to the priestly palace. Love and fear struggled in the hearts of these men as they followed their Master. They began to understand the meaning of his words regarding his arrest. But obscure as they were, there was no reason why they should be recognized as his disciples, so they pressed into the crowd of people attracted by the noise, the light and the excitement. But the court or guard hall was guarded to keep out the crowd, and only those were permitted to enter who were known. Here John had the advantage. Perhaps as a fish merchant he was on terms of acquaintance with the household or for some other cause was known to the servants of the high priest. By this means Peter also was admitted, and formed one of the group standing around the fire on that chilly spring night.

But the maiden who kept the door had noted Peter's appearance. Perhaps she had seen him on the streets of Jerusalem or in the temple with Jesus. She said to him, therefore, "You are one of this man's disciples, are you not?" There was no malice in the question. The followers of so harmless a leader would be considered quite too insignificant to be arrested. Perhaps she knew John to be a friend of Jesus, and seeing his friendship for Peter, she included him in the group. But the question terrified the disciple. To what danger might not his connection with the Master lead? The darkness, the glare of torches, the half-hidden faces of the soldiers, the awe hanging over his soul as he thought of Jesus' possible fate robbed him of the courage he had shown in the garden, and he denied that he was one of that circle whose names were to be held in highest reverence and love by the Christian ages. Thus the impulse of self-saving had brought Peter to ruin. Had he frankly confessed his fellowship with Jesus he would probably have suffered no molestation, for the servants were only curious to know something of the mysterious prisoner who had been taken within. But even if his confession had meant death him, it would have been better a hundred times over to suffer with Jesus than to find himself in that agony of humiliation which came with reflection upon his denial.

Meantime, in the palace Jesus found himself before that man in whom ecclesiastical Judaism found its most characteristic expression. Annas sought to make Jesus talk in order to learn something of his purposes and the number of followers he could rally to what these Jews were sure was intended to be a popular movement against themselves. But Jesus waved aside his questions as useless. They assumed a conspiracy. He had only preached a gospel. He had no secrets. There were no such schemes in his mind as those of which they accused him. No such midnight assemblies as this could be charged against him. He had ever acted openly, and the sting of this word must have smarted in the breasts of these enraged churchmen. They could ask the people what he had taught. All was open and known. So searching and rebuking were these simple words of Jesus, that one of the underlings of the court, catching the spirit of anger that flamed in the hearts of these Sanhedrists who shrank under the whip of Christ's rebuke, struck him in the face in a pretended effort to uphold the majesty of that court of murder, by demanding why he so responded to the high priest. Jesus quietly answered that if he had done evil in telling the simple truth, they should show him in what manner and if not, why should he be smitten? The self-mastery of the Savior under such insults is nothing less than marvelous when judged by human standards. Even Paul in a similar case responded to his smiters with a withering curse.

But Peter's tragedy was not complete. The maiden at the door had not been convinced by his denial, and perhaps its very emphasis had further assured her that he was a follower of Jesus. His fear was his undoing, for she followed up the matter and whispered to others her suspicions. Presently some of them recognized in him the one who in the garden had drawn a sword to assault the servant of the high priest and again they questioned him. Peter saw the circle close about him and was wild with apprehension. No calculated apostasy was his, but the effort to save himself growing out of pure panic. He denied that he was a disciple of Jesus. They pressed upon him with the taunt that his northern dialect, the very language of his denial, proved him to be a Galilean. And now at the extremity of fear Peter shouted with oaths that he did not know the Lord. At that moment, the earliest tokens of the dawn appeared and the cock crowed, the signal of which Jesus had spoken. The disciple who had felt himself so strong a few days before and even on the preceding day, had turned in his terror from all that was most dear to him, and denied the very Master who was dearer to him than life. No wonder that the note of coming day came to Peter as the trumpet of judgment, and when through the opened door of the inner court where Jesus stood, he saw the Lord turn and look at him with eyes full of sadness and pity, he rushed from the place, forgetting all but his dreadful fall, and to him the most frightful part of the tragedy which that day brought was the memory that the heart of his suffering Master had been still further wrung by the denial of his chief disciple.

We shall quite miss the value of this lesson if we do not see that Peter's case is our own. We do not hate our Lord, but like Judas we sell him. We do not disbelieve him, but like Peter we deny him, and in so doing we crucify afresh the Son of God and put him to an open shame. In whatever way we might have stood up for Christ, and by our heroism made it easier to win the battle for his cause, and yet have turned away to self-saving, and to avoid inconvience, in us again Peter has stood by the fire, and at the question of a girl, or the snear of a bystander, has denied his loyalty and love, while evermore Jesus saw it and sighed.

TOPIC FOR MAY 28.

ESTABLISHED IN HEART.

(Rom. 1: 11, 12; Ps. 112: 1-10.)

He whose heart is established is steadfast as the granite hills. He who has no firmness of purpose, no anchorage, is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind and tossed. One whose heart is established may be told by his gait. His walk is with firmness and purpose. So it is that the figurative walk—the conversation as it is called in the old English version of the Bible—of such established hearts is strong and true.

To have the established heart is to have the heart that is fixed as the Northern Star in its love, in its choice, in its purpose. Most established of all is the heart that is stayed on God. That is a love that is high indeed; a purpose that is firm.

Such a heart never wavers from the right. It can trust itself in the moment of dangerous temptation. As a chain is no stronger than its weakest link, so is a character no stronger than its weakest moment, when sudden temptation is able to overwhelm one, that heart is not firmly established.

An established heart is never overcome by opposition or enmity; one who trusts in God cannot be moved. Fears do not annoy when the conscience is right and the heart is steadfast. Said Brutus—

> "There is no terror, Cassius, in your threats,
> For I am armed so strong in honesty
> That they pass by me as idle wind,
> That I regard not."

His heart he declared was established in his firm purpose and upright, honest conduct. Hence human opposition had no terrors. Thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just.

Such a steadfast heart reposes amid storms and strifes and dangers, calm and unmoved. When billows roll it rests.

> "Rocked in the cradle of the deep,
> Lay me down in peace to sleep,
> Secure I rest upon the wave,
> For thou, O Lord, hast power to save."

This is the song of an established heart that trusts in God. If every soul out on the dark ocean of storm-swept life could only sing it!

To such a settled, steadfast heart comes a peace that passeth understanding. One of the most distressing things in life is indecision. Once decide and contentment soons follows. Comfort and quietude come when the heart is once fixed. Decide, then, O unsettled one! Decide, O tempted, distressed and doubting one! Fix your heart, establish it, let it cling to Christ, let it be stayed on the rock. Say, "Let my past mistakes suffice. I will, in future, be firm and established."

Let the heart be established upon high places. Think on high things. Undertake high things. When one builds his house he seeks the high ground. It is more healthful. So when one establishes his heart, it should be on a high place. Go up for your foundation upon Jesus Christ, other than which foundation can no man lay. He who will condescend to build on no lower plain will find peace in his soul. "Let not your heart be troubled. . . . . In my Father's house are mansions."

Naming the Baby is a pleasant and agreeable task imposed on parents, but naming the disease, when symptoms seem to conflict, according to laid-down theories, has troubled many a doctor. Better let the name go than to lose sight of the main principle—to remove the impurities in the blood—which is the source of nine-tenths of human ailments.

That is the theory and working principle of Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer. Therein lies its success. It is not a drug store medicine, but is sold to the people direct, or through local agents. For further particulars write to Dr. Peter Fahrney, 112-114 South Hoyne Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Bulletin, quarterly, sent to any address for one dollar. All orders should be addressed to the Bethany C. E. Company, 798 Republic St., Cleveland, O. Each course has a director: H. L. Willett is director of Bible study; W. J. Lhamon is director of studies in Missions; F. D. Power is director of studies Concerning the Disciples. This column is set apart to the use of these directors.]

The Peerless Religion.

By W. J. Lhamon, Director.

It is expected that the last five chapters of the handbook, "Fields and Forces," will be of unusual interest to our students. As stated in a footnote, these chapters are very brief in relation to the subjects treated, but the author has a conviction that cardinal principles are capable of statement in a few words. And it is the cardinal principles of these great religions that he has sought to give. In the case of any of these great religions, minor teachings and their application to life might fill volumes. It is hoped, at all events, that when the student has mastered these chapters, he will have a fair introduction both to the truths and the errors, the merits and the demerits, of the religions treated. The crowning conviction which, we trust, will rise in the souls of our students upon the reading of these chapters, is this, that our own Christ is supreme and that his teachings are peerless.

Whatever truth there may be in Hinduism, there must be in it error also, else such a civilization as that of India could never have grown out of it or have been tolerated by it. So of Buddhism and Confucianism. There is utterly a fault somewhere, else India and China and Japan would not have had through all these ages such a history, dark as midnight with ignorance and superstition and idolatry and social corruption and political stagnation. "By their fruits ye shall know them." The Savior's test is the absolutely practical and final one. Isolated sayings of Confucius or of Buddha may compare favorably with isolated sayings of Jesus, but that is not the test. The whole body of the teachings of the one must be compared with the whole body of the teachings of the other—and even that is not the final test. The men themselves must be compared, and their influence, whether beneficent or otherwise, upon the world.

Now when we attempt to compare the teachings of Buddha, for instance, or of Mohammed or Confucius with the teachings of Jesus, we find ourselves soon compelled to abandon the attempt and declare that there is no comparison; that there is nothing short of contrast. So with the life of Jesus: it has more of contrast than of comparison with other lives. And so also with his influence upon the world: it is matchless in its breadth and depth, and is heavenly in its beneficence.

Studied in the light of our Christian revelation these religions of the East demand, each and every one of them, additions here and substractions there, and explanations or emendations everywhere; and as to their influence upon the lives of men and nations, constant apologies are to be made. One cannot give examples in so short a paper, but our readers are asked to note for themselves the accuracy of our statement.

But Christ is peerless. From him we have nothing to subtract, to him we have nothing to add, and in him there is nothing unwholesome. By one who has written extensively upon these Eastern religions from a quite liberal standpoint, something quite good and true is found in each of them, and also something lacking or misleading. In contrast with them Christianity is called a pleroma, or fullness, the writer claiming that Christianity has all needful truth winnowed from all error. This peerlessness of Christ is simply the miracle of his manhood crowned with Godhood. When we realize it, we are constrained to exclaim anew, He is indeed "the Word made flesh," and "we have seen his glory as of the only begotten of God, full of grace and truth."

The following statements from Joseph Cook are a fitting conclusion to this essay:

"Not one of the great ethnic faiths has a hope of conquering the world."

"No other religion known to man can now be called a rival to Christianity."

"Max Muller has published the opinion that it is sheer futility to assume that the Bible is ever to be dazzled by any other book."

Note.—By a mistake the examination questions published in the last Bulletin, Missionary Department, are not, as they should be, upon the second quarter's work, but upon that of the last quarter. To correct the mistake, we will publish in the next Bulletin questions upon the second quarter's work, and give students ample time to answer the questions of both quarters. W. J. L.

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY.

Literature.

I PROMISE. By Rev. B. F. Meyer, B. A. United Society of Christian, Boston and Chicago. 50 cents.

This little volume deals with the Christian Endeavor pledge, and is written in the very best style of its well-known author. Nothing more helpful and stimulating has appeared as a part of the Christian Endeavor literature. I. "Salvation and Trust;" II. "Winning God's Attention;" III. "God Speaking;" IV. "What Would Jesus Do?" V. "Our Duty;" VI. "Conscience." These are the chapter titles, and give some indication of the character of the book. Its general circulation would be vastly helpful to the Christian Endeavor work.

NURSERY ETHICS. By Florence Hull Winterburn. New York. The Baker and Taylor Co. 5 and 7 E. Sixteenth St.

This is the second edition of this volume, evidence in itself that the book has met a felt want in the home. The fourteen chapters in this little volume are replete with such information as all parents should possess. The talented author is a genuine apostle of child-training, and in her the children have found one who knows them and understands the philosophy of child-culture. "It is a great gift to be able to interpret a child's inarticulate murmurs." Indeed it is, and because we believe this volume will help many mothers to do this, we could wish it a place in every family nursery.

FROM THE CHILD'S STANDPOINT. Views of Child-life and Nature. A Book for Parents and Teachers. By Florence Hull Winterburn, author of "Nursery Ethics." New York. The Baker and Taylor Co. 5 and 7 East Sixteenth St.

The author of this volume has studied child-nature to good effect. She is wise in the ways of childhood, and her advice is marked by wisdom throughout. Herein is a great lack in many parents and teachers. They do not understand the nature of a child. They have forgotten their own childish feelings, and have not taken pains to study the children carefully whom it is their duty and privilege to train. Every thoughtful person as he grows older sees more in childhood than he once did, and often wishes that he had his work of child-training to do over again. We cannot deal with children wisely until we have entered sympathetically into their thoughts and feelings. This volume is a valuable contribution to child-culture and to home-making. As such we welcome it and wish it a wide reading.

MAGAZINES.

A beautifully illustrated booklet entitled, "Michigan a Summer and Health Resort State," has been received. Among the resorts highly commended is Macatawa Park, of which our readers may have heard. No state in the union is more highly blessed with resorts than Michigan, and this illustrated pamphlet sets them forth to good advantage.

Hon. John D. Long, Secretary of the Navy is the author of a very notable contribution to the forthcoming (June) number of Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly. It is entitled, "The Building of the New Navy," and is illustrated with nearly forty elaborate pictures and official plans, showing types of all the classes of United States war vessels, from the torpedo boats and destroyers to the most formidable first-class battleship, such as the new Maine, the Kearsarge and the Kentucky. In the course of this elaborate and comprehensive paper, Secretary Long reviews, in a most appreciative manner, the work of his distinguished predecessors in office—Secretaries Hunt, Chandler, Whitney, Tracy and Herbert—whose efficient and patriotic energy in the building of the new navy led up to the glorious results consummated under the present administration.

The Century will issue three special numbers: June, "Out-of-doors number;" July, "The Story-tellers' number;" An article by Henry Van Dyke on "Fisherman's Luck," and a dozen striking pictures of Niagara Falls by the artist, Castaigne, are two of the features of the June issue.

There will be four short stories in the June Scribner's, suitable for the season when the summer travel has just begun. Two of the best known American writers, Henry James and Joel Chandler Harris, will be represented, and two new writers, William Allen White (famous for his editorial, "What's the Matter with Kansas?") and Robert Shackleton, a New York journalist.

Harold Frederic's last novel, "The Market Place," is to be published simultaneously in America, England and Canada. The American and Canadian editions are to be illustrated by the best of the drawings made by Harrison Fisher for the story in its serial publications in the Saturday Evening Post, of Philadelphia. An especially interesting item of news is that the novel in book form will contain much that was omitted from it in its serial publication and in book form only can the reader have the story just as it left the pen of the author.

To the Youth's Companion of May 25th, Memorial-day number, Hon. Justin McCarthy, M. P., will contribute recollections of Henry Ward Beecher's visit to England during the Civil War, when he made his great speeches for the Union cause. Two other timely contributions will be Homer Green's story of "Jim's Widow," who vindicated the memory of her husband, a supposed deserter; and "The Parshley Celebration," a story by Sarah Orne Jewett, suggesting a new way to celebrate Memorial day.

Ian Maclaren, the author of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," who is now lecturing in this country, has engaged to write a series of articles for the Ladies' Home Journal, and the first will appear in the May issue of that magazine. The general topic upon which he has agreed to write is of the pastor and his congregation. He will emphasize the relation that should exist between a minister and his congregation, how one can aid the othdr, and other similar phases of church work. Being, as is well known, pastor of a large church in Liverpool, and one of the most popular ministers in England, Dr. Watson is in position to speak by the light of successful experience, and his articles will be read with keen interest.

KIDNEY TROUBLE.

The Most Prevalent, Dangerous and Deceptive Disease.

Thousands Have it and Don't Know it.

Pains and aches come from excess of uric acid in the blood, due to neglected kidney trouble. Kidney trouble causes quick or unsteady heart-beats, and makes one feel as though they had heart trouble, because the heart is overworking to pump the thick, kidney-poisoned blood through the viens and arteries.

Soreness or uncomfortable feeling in the back indicates kidney trouble of no small importance.

The passing of scanty or profuse quantities of urine is a warning of kidney trouble. If you want to feel well you can make no mistake by first doctoring your kidneys.

The famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, is the true specific for kidney, bladder and urinary troubles. It has cured thousands of apparently hopeless cases after all other efforts have failed.

Sold on its merits by all druggists in fifty-cent and one dollar sizes. A sample bottle sent free by mail to any address. Also a book telling all about Swamp-Root and its wonderful cures. When writing, address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., and mention that you read this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

BAKER.

William Baker was born April 28, 1830, died April 10, 1899. In about 1845 he united with the church and lived a faithful member of it until death. He was married in Washington Co., Ind., in 1853. He moved to Illinois, where he lived in 1865, at which time he removed to this county, the place of his birth. During the rebellion he served his country as a prvate in Company C, One Hundred and Eleventh Illinois. At the time of going into the army he had a wife and four children. He never saw this dear wife again. Three of his children died also, later. Afterwards he married Nancy E. Grace on July 31, 1866, and as the result of this union five children were born, all of whom are alive and reside in Washington Co., Ind. He served the church as elder while in Illinois, also in Indiana. Bro. Baker was physically and spiritually a strong man, but was taken away by pneumonia with other complications. The community realizes it has lost one of its very best citizens, six children have lost a noble father and the aged wife a loving husband. At the time of his funeral service many could not gain admission to the church house, it was so crowded. All hearts seemed unusually sad. To know him was to love him. His life for Christ was a nobler sermon than I could preach. We recommend his faith to his bereaved. Bro. Baker was a very appreciative reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The writer conducted the funeral service in Walnut Grove church house, which is six miles northeast of Campbellsburg, Ind.

U. G. SUTHERLIN.

BRUNER.

Francis M. Bruner, ex-president of Oskaloosa College, scholar, gentleman, soldier, Christian, died at his home in DesMoines, Ia., May 2nd, aged 65 years. Bro. Bruner had been an intense sufferer from broken health for several years, and only his natural vitality, sustained by his indomitable will spared him to us so long. The funeral services were held in the University Church May 5th, conducted by the pastor. Dr. D. R. Dungan, of St. Louis, Mo., an associate of the deceased for a quarter of a century, delivered the principal address. Two comrades of earlier days, besides Bro. Dungan, were present to honor his memory: N. A. McConnell and Dean Everest. Bro. Bruner was a Kentuckian by birth, reared in Illinois, graduated from Knox College in 1857, studied two years at the Royal University at Halle, Prussia, visited Berlin, Cologne, Manheim and Paris for research. Returning to America in 1860, he began to evangelize with splendid success. In 1863 he enlisted in the 7th Reg., Co. A, U. S. Infantry, and was made captain. He served one year in Florida, and became pastor of the Church of Christ at Monmouth, Ill., where he served till called to the presidency of Oskaloosa College in 1870. Six years he wrought in that capacity, and contributed much to the scholarship and permanent establishment of our educational institutions. Subsequently be was president of Abingdon College till Eureka was founded. Bro. Bruner was a thinker and a writer of marked ability. A book of profound research, now in the hands of the printer, was completed only a few weeks before his decease. The writer read the manuscript of much of it, and believes that it will more than sustain his reputation. "He served his generation by the will of God and fell asleep." He was glad to go to his rest. University Church adds another name to its long list of honored dead, and while grief-stricken over its loss, rejoices in the heritage of a saintly man. He finished his course with joy. God comfort Sister Bruner and her children. I. N. MCCASH.

DesMoines, Ia., May 6, 1899.

DODSON.

Narcissus Adaline Dodson, nee Hensley, was born in Virginia, May 2, 1829. She came with her father to St Louis Co., Mo., at an early age. She was married to Wm. H. Dodson Sep. 11, 1848. He preceded her to the better land by six and a half years. She was the mother of six children, three boys and three girls, nve of whom are still living. One girl died when seven years of age. She obeyed the gospel under the preaching of Eld. J. J. Frost, 28 years ago, since which time she has ever proved faithful to the Lord's cause, and died in the hope of immortality. She has been living at and near Hematite all of her married life. All of her children were members of the church. The oldest is our well-known Bro. I. B. Dodson, who has been preaching in Southeast Missouri for 15 years. Mother Dodson was very faithful in her attendance at church and in all Christian duties, and will be much missed by the church and community, and especially by her children, whom we commend to the grace of God, and to her and their father's noble example, that they may meet them again where parting will be unknown. S. W. ROBINSON.

MAJOR.

Mrs. Melinda Madison Major, wife of Dr. T. T. Major, died Friday, April 14, 1899, at Sedalia, Mo., of kidney trouble. She was born at Fayette, Mo., in 1832, and was educated at the Baptist college, Georgetown, Ky. In 1864 she was married to Dr. Major. With him are left three children to mourn the loss of a noble wife and loving mother. Of her personality it may be said that she was a remarkable woman—remarkable in her charity, her Christian spirit, her loyalty to friends and her devotion to all that was best and purest. She loved life, too, with that wholesome love which is optimistic and finds sweetness even under the most adverse circumstances, and even when death was creeping closer and closer, her cheerful interest in those about her did not desert her, and not once did she speak of that which was inevitable. Her Christianity was not a theory, but a fact which was proven every day of her life and it is possible no individual in this city ever numbered so many loving friends and to none bereaved has more sympathy been given. The funeral services were held at the First Christian Church, of which deceased had been a faithful member so many years Sunday, April 16 at 2 o'clock; Rev. Putman officiating. R. P.

MILLION.

Miss Izora Belle Million, born Sep. 25, 1860, passed away April 28, 1899, aged 38 years, seven months and three days. The circumstances surrounding the death of Sister "Zora" were peculiarly sad. She was one of the unfortunate victims of the Kirksville (Mo.) cyclone of April 27, in which she was so severely injured that she died the next morning. She had been visiting her sister, who lives in Kirksville—Mrs. Hallie Mills—who also was severely and seriously but not dangerously injured, when the storm occurred. Sister Zora resided near Woodlawn, Mo., where she was one of the most active, consistent, conscientious and earnest members of the Christian Church. She was loved by all who knew her. She leaves to mourn her departure a host of friends, two sisters and her aged mother. She was called suddenly, but her lamp was trimmed and burning, she was ready for the summons. Her last request was that the writer should preach her funeral which sad duty on account of sickness, he could not perform at her burial, but it will be his sad pleasure (D. V.) to do so at memorial services to be held at his next regular appointment at Woodlawn, the third Sunday in May. May the Lord comfort the suddenly bereaved and sorrowing family.

C. H. STRAWN.

Paris, Mo., May 4, 1999.

OGLE.

Mary Alice Carbaugh was born Oct. 8, 1849, died April 27, 1899, at her home near Fishhook, Ill. June 11, 1868, she married Isaac J. Ogle, and leaves a husband and nine children and one stepchild and an host of relatives and friends to mourn their loss. In 1863 she united with the Christian Church. of Perry, Ill., and 1893, when the Mound Prarie Christian Church, near Beverly, Ill., was organized, she became one of its charter members. Here her funeral was held April 28; conducted by J. D. Dabney, assisted by the W. R. C., of which she was also a member. She was a faithful, practical, every-day Christian and will be greatly missed by all. J. D. DABNEY.

El Dora, Ill.

OREAR.

W. D. Orear was born Jauary 16, 182-, in Montgomery County, Kentucky. He died April 16, 1899, at Virginia, Bates Co., Mo. He was married to Selina Gipson, Montgomery County, Kentucky, Jan. 20, 1857. To this union five children were born. Carrie, the oldest daughter, has crossed over the river. At the age of about 21 Bro. Orear united with the Christian Church at old Spencer Church, Kentucky. He again was reinstated in the church at Virginia, Mo., September, 1897. He spent his last days as a consecrated Christian. The funeral and interment was conducted by the writer at Virginia, Mo. J. H. JONES.

WARREN.

After an illness lasting five months, Kemper, the eldest child and only son of W. R. and Susan A. Kemper Warren, died at Connellsville, Pa., on May-day morning, aged four years and seven months. On the 2nd inst. funeral services were conducted by Bro. Plattenburg, of Uniontown, assisted by Rev. W. A. Edie, First Presbyterian Church, Connellsville; interment private in Hill Grove cemetery. The expressions of sympathy from members of Bro. Warren's congregation have been genuine and heartfelt and are shared by all those in the community who have known the bereaved parents even slightly. Publishers' Notes.

YOU WILL BE GLAD

To know that H. W. Everest's late book, "The Science and Pedagogy of Ethics," is nearing completion. But little remains of the typesetting to be done, then it will go into the hands of the binder and be ready for the reader in a short time. We cannot now state definitely the time this work will be ready for delivery, but will give notice in these columns later.

In the meantime get ready to investigate a thought-provoking book by one of the ripest scholars and best thinkers among our brethren.

"MARY ARDMORE"

Is a good book to place in the hands of those who should understand the New Testament teachings on conversion and kindred subjects. J. H. Stark, the author of "Mary Ardmore," has planned an attractive story in this book, telling it in a fascinating style and in the end leaves the mind of the reader full of the teachings of Scripture relative to what Christ teaches on conversion. The reader will be convinced of what is sound doctrine by Mary's keen wit and logic. It is a work of 328 pages, and the price is $1.00, postage paid.

"AUNT MARIA'S SATURDAY TALK SERIES"

Are just the books to delight and instruct the children and will also edify the grown people. These books are true stories of incidents in the lives of many great men and women who have been conspicuous in the world's history. The titles of these books are "Little Presidents," "Little Kings," "Little Queens," "Little Orators," "Little Generals," "Little Statesmen." They are beautifully bound in cloth, printed on excellent paper and the price is 50 cents per volume postpaid or $2.50 for the six volumes, postpaid. These books should be in the hands of the young, as they will exert an influence for good on their minds.

"QUEEN ESTHER,"

By M. M. Davis, is highly commended by competent judges who have read this late book. Among those who are eminently qualified to testify of the merits of this work is Anna D. Bradley, of Ft. Worth, Tex. The following is an extract of what she has written concerning M. M. Davis' "Queen Esther:" "The book of Esther has always had a peculiar charm for me, and I thought I had studied it well, but with my friend and brother, M. M. Davis, as guide, I find whole storehouses of jewels which my eyes had been too dull to see."

THE DOCTRINES AND DOGMAS OF MORMONISM

Are examined and refuted by D. H. Bays in his late book bearing the title as mentioned at the head of this article. The author was a devout Mormon for about twenty-five years. He knows all the strong points on which the Mormon Church bases its doctrines and he is well acquainted with the weakness of the cause of Mormonism.

This book by D. H. Bays can truthfully be called the most thorough exposition of the doctrines of Mormonism now before the public. Armed with the facts it contains you will be prepared to answer the Mormon elder. The book contains 460 pages, cloth binding and the price is $1.50.

Stray Notices.

LESSONS IN SOUL-WINNING, by E. H. Kellar, is a work containing many valuable suggestions in soul winning, and will be very helpful to those who wish to aid the pastor in personal work. 184 pages. Cloth, 75 cents. Christian Publishing Co.

IN THE DAYS OF JEHU, by J. B. Ellis, is a well-written and intensely interesting Bible narrative. The lesson taught is that idolatry is ruin and the worship of God is life and peace. 189 pages. Cloth, 75 cents. Christian Publishing Co.

ROSA EMERSON, or, A Young Woman's Influence, by John Augustus Williams, is a story of the Lodge, the Church and the School. It portrays the wonderful influence for good that a noble woman may exert on her community. 373 pages. Cloth, $1.00. Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis.

ACROSS THE GULF, by Mrs. N. M. Vandervoort, is a story of the times of Christ. Many of the great truths spoken by the Master are mingled with historical facts and traditions, showing that Christ is the Saviour of mankind. 268 pages. Cloth, $1.00. Christian Publishing Co.

HOT FOR THE PASTOR, by W. T. Hacker, is a story delineating obstacles and hindrances in a preacher's life, and also the many hindrances the progress of the church. A good book to correct the habit of criticising by many church members. 152 pages. Cloth, $1.00. Christian Publishing Co.

HUGH CARLIN, or, Truth's Triumph, by J. H. Stark, is a well-planned and well-developed religious story, dealing with some of the modern phases of religion in a very practical and striking manner. It takes high rank as a religious novel. 185 pages. Cloth, $1.00. Christian Publishing Co.

STUDIES IN ACTS, or, the New Testament Book of Beginnings, by W. J. Lhamon, is a work that deals with things fundamental in the Christian system in a judicial spirit, among which are the First Sermon After the Ascension, First Church, First Persecutions, First Martyr, First Gentile Convert, First Missionaries, First History of the Holy Spirit, etc. 420 pages. Cloth, $1.25. Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis, Mo.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling tells an amusing story at his own expense. During his stay in Wiltshire one summer he met little Dorothy Drew, Mr. Gladstone's granddaughter, and, being very fond of children, took her in the grounds and told her stories. After a time Mrs. Drew, fearing that Mr. Kipling must be tired of the child, called her, and said: "Now, Dorothy, I hope you have not been wearying Mr. Kipling." "Oh, not a bit, mother," replied the small celebrity, "but he has been wearying me."

It was in a Latin class, and a dull boy was wrestling with the sentence, "Rex fugit," which, with a painful slowness of emphasis, he had rendered, "The king flees."

"But in what other tense can the verb fugit be found?" asked the teacher.

A long scratching of the head and a final answer of "Perfect," owing to a whispered prompting.

"And how would you translate it, then?"

"Dunno."

"Why, put a 'has' in it."

Again the tardy emphasis drawled out: "The king has fleas."

What We Plead For

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition,
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The strained relations between General Brooke and General Gomez, which for a few days threatened to become a three-cornered altercation with these two and Secretary Alger, has at last been brought to a happy issue and the payment of the troublesome $3,000,000 to the Cuban soldiers is to begin this week. May 27 is the date set for the first payment. The most critical stage in the preceedings was passed when Gen. Brooke waived his demand that the Cuban soldiers should surrender their arms to the American military authorities when they received their money. This had been the chief point of resistance with Gomez and the Cuban army generally. The point was not really a vital one and the concession seems to have been wisely made. But just when all seemed to be peaceably settled it was reported that the Secretary of War disapproved of the arrangement to have the arms handed over to the municipal authorities. Later dispatches indicate that his disapproval was based on a misunderstanding of the scheme and has disappeared with further explanations. Gomez is to co-operate with the American authorities in the distribution of the bounty and he has issued a manifesto to the Cubans, explaining and defending, as well as he can, his varying attitude toward the Americans during the last few months. It has been a racillating course and stands badly in need of explanation. In view of the insignificant character of the concession which Gen. Brooke has made and the complexity of the difficulty which he has apparently solved, he deserves great credit for his skillful handling of a difficult and delicate situation.

There is no event of the current week which can compare in far-reaching importance with the meeting of the Peace Conference at the Hague. The first session was held on Thursday, which happened to be the Czar's birthday, and was occupied entirely by interchange of compliments and courteous addresses to the Czar as the originator of the conference and to Queen Wilhelmina as its hostess. Baron de Staal, Russian Ambassador at the Court of St. James and chairman of the Russian delegation, was chosen president of the conference. In his opening speech he outlined the field in which the conference is to work and enumerated the topics which it is to discuss. There are three general topics which are, in the order in which he mentioned them, as follows: First, arbitration and the establishment of a permanent international tribunal for the settlement of as many disputes as possible without war; second, the laws of war, whereby war may be made as humane and civilized as it is possible for war to be; third the restriction of military expenditures and the abolition of armaments. The order in which these topics are named indicates probably their relative importance as conceived by the president of the conference or, at least, the order in which they will be taken up. It may be somewhat disappointing to some to find the question of disarmament, for the discussion of which the conference was avowedly called, relegated to the last place on the program, but the order is nevertheless natural and logical. Disarmament will never be tried as an experiment. If it comes at all, it will come because the nations have found another way of settling their difficulties. Arbitration must be reduced to a fixed and definite system, and its efficacy must be proved by experience before any nation will consent to abolish the present means of deciding disputes. Disarmament will come about without effort when armaments are seen to be useless. But this change cannot be wrought in a day, and meanwhile it is important that the inhumanity of war should be reduced to the lowest possible degree. Hence the second topic rightfully has a place. There are great difficulties to be overcome in settling any one of these problems, and one need not allow sentiment to obscure his vision of this fact. But it is a hopeful sign that an earnest attempt is being made to solve the problem, and it is also a hopeful sign that by common consent attention is being turned first of all to the positive side of the work in providing for a permanent international court of arbitration.

The course of events in the Philippines has not changed materially during the past week. The desire of the Filipino leaders to make peace and the unwillingness of the natives to keep up the war are becoming constantly more evident. Another set of peace commissioners has been sent to Manila to confer with Gen. Otis, commissioned this time by Aguinaldo and his Congress. The old request for an armistice to give the Filipino Congress time to consider terms of peace, was again made and refused. Gen. Otis continues to hold that if Aguinaldo had power to make war without consulting the Congress he has authority also to make peace. Orders have been sent, however, by Gen. Otis to Generals Lawton and MacArthur, not to push forward the aggressive campaign while peace negotiations are pending. This gives all the practical advantage of an armistice and at the same time does not involve the slightest official recognition of the Filipino Government. Moreover, the active campaign can be resumed without notice whenever it becomes apparent that the insurgents are using this temporary quiet to prepare for further hostilities. The Filipino Congress has at least gotten itself together and opened its session. Aguinaldo has sent to his Congress a message urging it to hold out to the bitter end. To the casual observer it would appear that they have about done that already. The bitter end is not far off, and the farther they try to postpone it the bitterer it will necessarily be. This message may be put down as a piece of the policy of bluff which Aguinaldo has been pursuing for a long time. The message was addressed to the Congress, but it was really meant for Gen. Otis and the Associated Press. He wants peace, but he hopes to secure better terms by not appearing eager. It is reported that Gen. Luna, who is the most important of the commanders of the Filipinos in the field, is not in sympathy with the attempts of Aguinaldo and the Congress to secure peace, and that if peace is made he may keep up the war as the leader of bands of guerillas. This, however, is mere unconfirmed rumor. During the week there has been but little fighting, but the gunboat, Laguna de Bay, has continued to move up the Rio Grande, keeping pace with Major Kobbe's command, which is moving along the bank of the river. The town of Candaba was surrendered to this double force without resistance. The expected engagement before San Fernando has not taken place, and the body of insurgent troops which were believed to be massed in that neighborhood seems to have faded away.

The Sunday newspaper is a calamity which has not yet befallen England, but there is much excitement in religious circles in that country now for fear of an invasion by this characteristically American enterprise. Two important London dailies, the Telegraph and the Mail, which have hitherto published only six editions a week, have begun a Sunday issue. It is not yet a Sunday paper in the sense in which we understand the term. It is not a mammoth illustrated magazine containing as much matter as a half dozen ordinary volumes and requiring practically the whole day for even a cursory perusal of it. It is just an ordinary newspaper published on Sunday. This is a very different and a much less dangerous thing, but the danger lies in what it may lead to. Accordingly, the religious forces of England, both pulpits and papers, have organized a campaign to fight the Sunday newspaper. A list of newsdealers who do not handle the Sunday edition has been drawn up and circulated widely with a view to boycotting all who do handle it. There is also being planned a popular appeal to Parliament for prohibitory legislation on the subject. Probably the inborn conservatism of the British mind would prevent the popularity of any such monstrosity as the American Sunday newspaper, but if British conservatism is good for anything, now is the tim for it to distinguish itself by nipping this evil in the bud. The American press, with all its faults, is the finest in the world. It has given to the world exhibitions of enterprise and push such as have never been witnessed before or elsewhere. We are proud of it—six days in the week. But we do not like to hear the term, "the American Sunday newspaper," pass into common speech as a term of reproach on a par with "the Continental Sunday."

It is reported that the Czar has authorized the organization of a reform commission to investigate the present system of dealing with criminals and the abuses to which he is liable, and to recommend the improvement or abolition of the present system of exile to Siberia with hard labor. Apparently there has come home to the mind of the Czar, what the rest of the civilized world has had for years, a realization of the scandalous abuses to which the Siberian exile system lends itself, and it is to his credit that he is taking steps to effect a reformation. Privy Councilor Mouravieff, minister of justice and a cousin of the foreign minister, Count Mouravieff, has been appointed as the head of the commission. The subject of criminology is one in which the Czar is said to have been taking a deep interest of late and this work of reform, although in the hands of a special commission, is to be carried on under his personal oversight. The reform may involve the total abandonment of the exile system and the substitution of penitentiaries and hard labor, as employed in other countries, or it may involve only the limitation of the penalty of deportation to a smaller list of offences. At any rate the present practice of sending convicts into exile upon the verdict of the local courts, analogous to our justices of the peace, is almost certain to be condemned. Not only does the motives of humanity and the advance of the science of criminology demand an improvement in the Russian method of dealing with this class, but it is obvious that the continuance of the exile system will stand in the way of the development of Siberia, which is of vast importance to the Czar in connection with his ambition for supremacy in the farther east.

The Presbyterian General Assembly is in session at Minneapolis. For the non-Presbyterian public the most interesting feature of the occasion is the fact that the case of Dr. McGiffert is again brought into prominence. Following the publication of Dr. McGiffert's "History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age," about eighteen months ago, he was accused of heresy by many presbyteries and synods which had no jurisdiction over him. The General Assembly last year requested that he should either disavow some of the statements made in this book, or retire from the Presbyterian ministry. To this request he has replied in a letter, marked throughout by the most perfect courtesy and kindliness, in which he respectfully declines to accept either one of the alternatives proposed. He cannot alter his views until he is convinced of error, and he cannot withdraw from the Presbyterian Church because his teaching is in agreement with that of the church in all essential particulars. If the assembly adheres to its original position, there will be a heresy trial. But it is not at all certain that the matter will not be dropped, for very many, even among those who are not in sympathy with Dr. McGiffert's views, are convinced that the trial of Dr. Briggs was not only a tedious and wearisome procedure, but that it did the church more harm than good, and that the present case will be no better. The Episcopalian Church has lately shown that, in spite of the protests of some of its own number, it is still a broad enough body to contain as large a man as Dr. Briggs. The "Briggs case" will not have been altogether in vain if the experience derived from it shall prevent the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church from bringing into existence a "McGiffert case."

Admiral Dewey, who has left Manila on the flagship, Olympia, for his homeward journey, was received at Hong Kong with with proper honors both from the United States Consul General Wildman and from the British Colonial Government. It is understood that the Admiral will remain in Hong Kong two weeks for the cleaning up of his vessel and in further preparation for the long journey before him. It has been suggested by a writer in the Independent that the proper way to honor Admiral Dewey's return to the United States would be for the entire North Atlantic squadron to meet him at Gibraltar and escort him home. This would certainly be a mark of distinguished honor, and would make an imposing display across the Atlantic. His reception in the Harbor of New York will probably excel anything in that line which has ever transpired in the history of the country. We understand the Admiral is declining many invitations to attend banquets and receptions in various cities, as the condition of his health requires quiet and rest. It is to be hoped that the good sense of the American people will recognize this fact and not kill this popular hero with their kindness.

The United States Philippine Commission has submitted to the Filipinos a form of government which is to be in force until Congress legislates on the matter. This outline of government has the approval of the President and, we understand, is meeting with favor from the leading and most influential Filipinos. Following are the propositions submitted:

A Governor General, to be appointed by the President.

A Cabinet, to be appointed by the Governor-General; all the principal judges to be appointed by the President.

The heads of departments and judges to be either Americans or Filipinos, or both. A general advisory council, its members to be chosen by the people by a form of suffrage to be hereafter carefully determined upon.

The President earnestly desires that bloodshed cease and that the people of the Philippines at an early date enjoy the largest measure of self-government compatible with peace and order.

The Filipinos have requested the cessation of hostilities until they can present the question of peace to the people. While no armistice will be granted it is understood that hostilities will not be further prosecuted until the people of the islands have had time to consider the propositions which have been submitted. The form of government suggested is similar to that which now exists in Cuba. Influential Filipinos admit that it is a liberal form of government and allows much room for the exercise of home rule. The indications are that we are at the end of active military operations in the Philippines and the beginning of peace and civil order.

Rumors of the ill-health of Pope Leo XIII.have been almost continuous for some years. So often has he been at death's door, according to the newspaper reports, that the public has learned to be skeptical as to all such rumors. Most of them are unauthorized. But Leo has come to the time of life when we must expect some day soon one of these reports, whether authorized or not, will be true. Of late the reports of the Pope's sinking condition have been more persistent than usual. The statement comes from a generally trustworthy source that Leo has not been attending to his duties for some time, but that there is really an interregnum, and Cardinal Rampolla is de facto Pope. In this state of affairs, the question of Leo's successor naturally becomes an interesting one. The most promising candidate is this same Cardinal Rampolla, the Pope's private secretary. Next to him is mentioned Cardinal Parocchi, whose platform is the restoration of the temporal power of the papacy, dissolution of the Italian monarchy and the transformation of Italy into a confederation of small republics, including the papal state. The chances for the election of a non-Italian Pope are very small. Cardinal Vaughan has perhaps as good a chance as anybody outside of Italy. His strong point, which might be a weak point in a campaign for election to the papacy, is his desire for the reunion of Catholicism and Anglicanism. The method of electing a Pope makes it difficult to elect other than an Italian. When the Pope dies, without a moment's delay all the cardinals who are in Rome at the time are shut up in the building called the Conclave, and they are kept there, with no communication with the outside world, until they have elected a Pope by the necessary two-thirds vote. The Italian cardinals are always in a vast majority because no time is given for others to come to Rome. When the death of a Pope seems imminent, as at present, many cardinals flock to Rome to be on hand to participate in the election, but in case the Pope is "an unconscionable time a dying" (as Charles II. said of himself), many go back home and the numerical preponderance is still with the Italians. Naturally, Italian cardinals can usually be depended upon to choose an Italian Pope.

The American Line Steamer, Paris, from Southampton and Cherbourg for New York, struck on the outlying ridge of the Manacles, near Falmouth, England, on the 21st inst., at one o'clock in the morning. Fortunately, the sea was calm and the passengers were transferred in safety and with little excitement to small boats and taken to shore. There were 386 passengers aboard her. Capt. Watkins, commander of the vessel, stood on the bridge giving orders and preventing undue alarm until all were landed. No sufficient explanation of the accident has been given up to this time. So far the vessel has not been floated, and as it was within an hour of high tide when it struck, doubts are expressed as to whether it will be possible to save it. Much depends upon the state of the weather during the next few days.

CHILDREN'S DAY.

The first Lord's day in June has become a "Red-Letter" day in our calendar among the Sunday-schools. It is Children's Day for Foreign Missions. When it originated in 1880 we did not have a single mission on heathen soil. One of the addresses made before the Foreign Society in that year was "A Plea for Heathen Missions." After presenting urgent reasons why such work should be inaugurated, the speaker turned to the question of methods and said, in substance: "Let the children have a hand in this work. Appeal to them for their offerings to send the gospel to those who know nothing of Jesus Christ, and their young hearts will respond." As the seed of such a fund the speaker presented $1.13, mostly in copper coins, which a few children had sent by his hands to be used in sending the gospel to those who have it not.

The suggestion was heartily received, and on the following day the committee brought in a report approving the plan of starting such a fund, the nucleus of which had already been presented, and appointing a day when these offerings of the children should be collected in the following year. The corresponding secretary of the Foreign Missionary Society, at that time, wrote a letter to the editor of this paper, then in England, asking for a name for the fund. The reply was: "Let it be called the 'Children's Heathen Mission Fund,' and let there be fixed a day on which the offering for this fund shall be made by the children, and let it be perpetual throughout all our generations." This name was accepted and used for many years. The fund has never been thought of except as a fund for Foreign Mission work, and pre-eminently for the work in religiously destitute fields which we call heathen. The circumstances under which this fund originated, the spirit in which the matter was received by the convention and acted upon, the manifest blessing of God upon it and upon our schools, are all weighty considerations why the day should be perpetually observed and the funds used for the purpose for which it was originally established.

We say these things because we hear now and then of some school that has taken the money received from Children's Day, and given for the purpose of sending the gospel to the heathen, and used it to pay for a piano or organ, to liquidate a coal bill, or to cover a shortage on the preacher's salary. This is not right. It is not keeping faith with the children. It is not keeping faith with God, whose blessing we have asked upon the offerings of the children. It is not keeping step with the schools of the brotherhood. It is taking the bread of life from the perishing heathen to pay our home debts. We should adhere strictly to the original purpose, and use the proceeds of Children's Day for heathen missions. This was the thought in the heart of the children who made the first offering, and God put it there.

The steady growth which this fund has made from year to year, with slight exception, shows what fast hold it has taken on the hearts of the children in our schools. The sum has grown to be of considerable dimensions already, making a large proportion of our total receipts for the foreign work. But who can estimate the educational value of this observance of Children's Day from year to year? It is forming the habit of giving. It is fostering the missionary spirit. It is widening the children's knowledge of the world's condition and needs. It is enlisting them in the general co-operative work of the brotherhood. It is, in a word, bringing them nearer to Christ and identifying them with his church and people. In our Sunday-schools to-day are being developed the boys and the girls who are to be our future missionaries.

To accomplish the two ends in view—the increase of the fund and the moral and religious education of the children—pastors and church officers should give considerable attention to Children's Day. Let there be, when possible, a distinct service for the children. Let the songs, the recitations, the Scripture readings, the prayers, all be made to bear on the special nature of the occasion. Let it be the gladdest day in all the year for the children. Acquaint them with the names and fields of the missionaries. Tell them of the children in heathen lands that are being cared for and trained for Christ. Read them some message, when possible, from some of the missionaries. See that all have a chance to give, and see that they understand the purpose for which it is given, and the motive that should prompt the giving.

We trust that the coming Children's Day will be more generally observed by our schools, and that the offerings will be larger than in any previous year, so that at our Jubilee Convention it will appear that the children have not been left behind in the great progress which shall have been made in our missionary offerings.

CITY EVANGELIZATION.

One of the most important topics considered in the Congress of Disciples, recently held in this city, was the work of successfully presenting the gospel to the people in our congested centers. It is an intensely practical subject. It is also one of present and pressing importance. That the Disciples of Christ are beginning to consider the matter seriously is a favorable omen.

When the word "city" is employed in this connection, any places of the largest magnitude—as St. Louis, Cincinnati, Chicago, New York, Boston, Philadelphia—are to be thought of. Des Moines, Omaha, Kansas City, Indianapolis and Louisville are not the places in which the problem exists—the problem of reaching "the submerged tenth" with the gospel of salvation. The work is no holiday affair in the smaller cities, but it is far more serious in the great cities. The question relates, then, to the evangelization, in our own country, of Philadelphia, Boston, New York, Chicago, Cincinnati and St. Louis.

Nor is it a problem before the Disciples alone. Other Christians recognize the magnitude of the problem, the great difficulty of its practical solution, and its immediate importance. "How to Make Methodism Successful in New York," was a subject before the weekly meeting of Methodist ministers in that city some years ago, yet there are eighty or more Methodist churches in New York. One might be pardoned for thinking that Methodism is abundantly successful in this great center. In a sense, and to a degree, it is successful, but Methodism has not solved the problem of city evangelization. A few years ago there was inaugurated by these earnest disciples of our Lord an effort known as "The Forward Movement," on which was expended thirty thousand dollars per annum. "The Forward Movement" was located on Fourteenth Street, near Sixth Avenue. But "The Forward Movement" did not evangelize New York. There were earnestness, zeal, consecration, wisdom, enthusiasm, liberality, but the problem remains. A similar statement, with unimportant modifications, may be made concerning Presbyterians and Baptists.

But success has attended the efforts of the denominations here named in the great cities far beyond any success yet achieved by the Disciples of Christ. The problem with us is new and peculiarly difficult. A number of congresses will wrestle with the problem before we will succeed in successfully solving it. It is well to consider the question. It may be that it will be our high honor to yet show the world how to bear the Word of life with success to the perishing thousands in the great cities. Somebody must succeed. The gospel must triumph in our cities. The Christ must reign in the cities no less than in the country places. The problem of city evangelization will be solved. This is one of the certainties of the future. Why not by the Disciples of Christ?

The problem of city evangelization can not be solved by a large outlay of money. If money would solve the problem it would have been solved in New York by the Methodists, much more by the Episcopalians, equally by the Baptists and Presbyterians. All have expended and do now expend large sums of money in an effort—or better, in efforts—to turn men in the great cities from Satan to God. But the best that can be said concerning the efforts of these brethren is that they barely hold their own. Their forts are held—that is all.

The people will not enter the churches. This statement is made concerning the unevangelized masses. They do not attend the churches—they will not do so. They can be reached in larger numbers in halls and tents, but the evangelistic efforts in such places are spasmodic, and result in but little permanent good. A better plan than that of holding protracted meetings in temporary places must be found. By all means hold such meetings, but do something more. Let not the main dependence be on protracted meetings held in houses of worship, in halls and tents.

The work of city evangelization must be done by the church—and it must be done by the church as such.

At this point, in an intelligent and large consideration of the problem, the question of church organization presents itself. Thus far our organizations have had reference especially and chiefly to self-edification. In the organization of our churches but little attention has been given to the unevangelized masses. At this point there must be a radical change. We must come to regard the local church as a center of evangelistic effort. Organize the church with special reference to this character of work—meantime, keeping in mind the edification of the body.

This will lead us to depend less on public formal discourses and to a greater extent on informal, personal, face-to-face work.

To this end persons must be employed, men and women, who will bear the message of redeeming love to the people in their homes. Women are peculiarly fitted for this character of service.

A question worthy of consideration is the place of woman in the work of city evangelization. This topic was suggested in the St. Louis Congress. It is called up in this place, at this time, and in this form, that attention may be given to it with a deliberation and a fullness impossible in the Congress.

(Matt. 7:1-12; Rom. 14:7-13.)

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, May 31st.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: We should not judge each other maliciously, but should correct our own faults first and then judge our brother in charity.

One of the curious things about our poor human nature is the ease with which we see faults in others and our slowness to see our own errors. The tendency to judge one another harshly when all of us desire to be judged charitably is another strange fact. If those who live in glass houses should not engage in throwing stones at their neighbors, it would seem equally plain that those who desire to be charitably judged, and whose only hope is in receiving mercy, should not be harsh and censorious in judging others.

There is a great deal of philosophy in the advice of Jesus to first cast the beam out of our own eyes, in order that we may see more clearly how to cast the mote out of our brother's eye. By the time we have gone through a severe self-examination, and have earnestly sought to correct our own faults we are in a much better condition to deal justly and mercifully with our brother. Moreover, if we would judge ourselves more severely we would neither judge others so harshly nor be judged so harshly by others. "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

A constant source of friction in church life is the tendency of church members to criticise each other. This is not generally done directly, or it would not be attended with such evil results, but more generally indirectly. We talk about our brother behind his back, and the brother always hears of it and naturally resents the criticism. It may be laid down as a rule, too, that those people whose lives are farthest from being blameless are the ones who indulge most freely in criticising others. Whether this is the result of an unconscious effort to justify themselves by showing that others are as bad or worse, or whether it be the result of spiritual pride, the fault is none the less serious in its results. The rule which Jesus laid down, by which we may correct this evil tendency, is: "All things, therefore, whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them." If we would remember this rule when we are finding fault with our brothers, it would prevent many a harsh judgment and unkind criticism.

Granted that there are members in the church who are weak in faith and correspondingly weak in their lives—what then? According to the lesson given us in Rom. 14, we are to treat these weak and erring members charitably. It is not our province to sit in judgment over our weak brethren whose customs do not exactly harmonize with our ideas of propriety. "Who art thou that judgest the servant of another? To his own Lord he standeth or falleth." The fact that we shall "all stand before the judgment seat of Christ" is referred to as a reason why we should not be forward in judging one another, and especially our weak brethren.

The whole trend of this teaching is that we are not to seek to injure one another nor to condemn one another, but rather to bear each other's weaknesses, and especially that the strong should bear the infirmities of the weak and all seek to help each other. "Let us not therefore judge one another any more: but judge this rather, that no man put a stumblingblock in his brother's way or an occasion to fall." We should be more anxious to save our brother from sinning than to condemn him after he has sinned. None of us are sinless. While we are not to condone sin, neither must we magnify it, and as we would obtain mercy let us manifest that same mercy toward others. Love will win more sinners from their evil ways than our harsh words and unkind criticisms. If we have sinned in judging one another, let us here and now confess our faults one to another and seek henceforth to live together in charity.

PRAYER.

O Lord, before whom we shall all stand in judgment, we thank Thee that we shall be judged in mercy. We acknowledge that we have sinned against Thee, and our only hope for salvation is through Thy forgiving love. As we expect mercy from Thee, help us, we beseech Thee, to be merciful to each other, and not to judge one another in malice. Forgive our faults in this respect, and help us in the future to be more anxious about putting away the sin from our own lives in order that we may assist our brothers to rise to a higher life. For Thy name's sake. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

The friends of Christian education, and of Eureka College in particular, held an educational conference on the 15th inst. at Springfield, Ill. There were present about seventy-five delegates from different parts of the state besides the local attendance. The spirit of the meeting was excellent, and the conference was marked by great unanimity of feeling and of enthusiasm in the cause of Christian education. A number of very excellent speeches were made on different phases of the subject, all of which had for their object and effect the arousing of a greater interest in behalf of Eureka College. It was the pleasure of the editor of this paper to be present in the evening and listen to an admirable address on "Christian Education Essential to Good Citizenship," by Prof. B. J. Radford, of Eureka, and to add a few remarks as to the importance of a forward movement on the part of the friends of Eureka College for its endowment. One of the immediate results of the conference, besides that of awakening increased interest in the college, was the formation of a permanent organization in the interest of education, which will hold annual conferences. This, we believe, is a step in the right direction, and will be the means of fostering a deeper and wider interest in educational matters. The church at Springfield entertained the conference most hospitably, serving meals in the basement of the church. There is every reason why the Disciples of Christ in the great State of Illinois should rally to the support of Eureka College as they have not done before, and give it an endowment that will enable it to accomplish the work that it is capable of doing, and that is so much needed.

It is a matter of great rejoicing that the indications point to the end of the war in the Philippine Islands. The vigorous prosecution of the war, and the no less vigorous prosecution of the work of the Peace Commission in convincing the intelligent Filipinos of the purpose of the government not only to extend amnesty, but to grant home rule as fast as the people show themselves capable of performing the duties of self-government, have both contributed to this end. Already civil administration has been organized in many of the provinces, and the latest word is that Aguinaldo himself has sent an embassy to surrender what is left of his army to the United States forces. It now remains to be seen how well the government will justify the hopes of its friends in fulfilling the promise of dealing justly and generously with the people of these islands, and in promoting their peace and prosperity. It is a striking coincidence that these peace overtures are made just at the time of the assembling of the great Peace Conference in the Netherlands. May it prove a happy augury of the success of that conference in promoting peace on earth and good will among men.

The Bible College at Columbia, Mo., has completed another year of work, the closing exercises having been held on the evening of the 17th inst. Owing to a number of causes, the attendance during the past year has not been quite so good as in the previous sessions, but the spirit and tone of the speeches and papers of the young men and women were very encouraging. The board of trustees held its annual meeting, and its sessions were marked by unanimity and the spirit of determination to carry forward the work to ultimate success. Events have only confirmed the wisdom of the undertaking, and the board feels that whatever obstacles there may be in the way must be overcome and the institution be put upon a permanent basis. The speeches of the dean, Dr. W. T. Moore, and of the president of the board of trustees, T. P. Haley, at the closing exercises, were full of the spirit of hopefulness and of high appreciation of the value of the work that is being done. There is no opposition to this work in the state, and it only remains for the brethren who have the means to help the enterprise to become acquainted with its value and its practicability to secure for it the necessary assistance. Some changes were made, the nature of which will be given later.

One of the most remarkable phenomena of the present time is the formation of trusts of various kinds in this country. It is a phenomenon, too, that deserves a careful study by our ablest statesmen and philanthropists. The changes which they are likely to bring about in the social and industrial life of the country are of such a nature as to attract the serious attention of the people. It is gratifying to see that the press of all the political parties is speaking out in opposition to these combinations, and calling for such legislation as will, at least, prevent their evil effects upon the country. It is not strictly a party question, for leading men in all political parties see the possible dangers growing out of these trusts, and are lifting up their voices against them. It is certain that the platforms of both the leading political parties next year will contain planks denouncing trusts, but neither newspaper editorials nor platform denunciations will suffice to prevent these combinations of capital for purposes of private gain at public expense. It will require the wisest and sternest legislation, backed up by the moral sentiment of the country, to hold in check this modern evil which, like a mighty octopus, is fastening itself on the country.

Questions and Answers.

(1) If John's baptism was for the remission of sins, what sins did it remit; those under the Jewish dispensation, or those under the Christian?

(2) If John's baptism was for the remission of sins under the Jewish dispensation, why should Christ have died for the remission of sins?

(3) If only by and through the shedding of Christ's blood there can be a remission of sins under the Christian dispensation, why should John have baptized for the remission of sins? W. H. Lamaster.

Indianapolis, Ind., May 15.

(1) John's baptism did not remit any sins, but sins were remitted by God under John's baptism and these were, of course, the sins that had been previously committed; in other words, the sins of those who were baptized.

(2) John instructed those whom he baptized to believe on Him who should come after him, who was to die for the sins of the world.

(3) Because John was preparing a people for the Lord, and, as stated above, he instructed those whom he baptized that one was coming after him, the latchet of whose shoes he was not worthy to unloose, and on whom they should believe. John pointed his disciples to Jesus, saying: "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world."

(1) Did Jesus at any time during his earth-life claim to be the son of David?

(2) Did the thief on the the cross have a better conception of Christ's reign than did the apostles?

(3) Did Jesus in all his teachings touching the resurrection of the dead intend to plant the thought that He would resuscitate the physical body, or was it not rather the resurrection of the morally dead which He taught? I. F. Tanner.

(1) Jesus designated himself as the Son of God and as the Son of Man. He was sometimes designated by others as the son of David, and He does not disclaim that He was a descendant of the Davidic line. He raised a question with the Pharisees once when they called Him the son of David as to how David in the Spirit then could call Him Lord, if He was his son. This, however, was not denying His Davidic descent according to the flesh, but was designed to show that in the higher sense He was the Son of God and, therefore, David's Lord. This also is Paul's teaching, who in Rom. 1:3, 4 says: "Who was born of the seed of David according to the flesh, and was declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness, by the resurrection of the dead.

(2) It would seem that he did have a clearer conception of Christ's spiritual origin than the apostles had at that time. There seems to have been a rift in the cloud which had obscured the vision of this malefactor which enabled him to see, for the moment, the triumph of the just One who was suffering by his side.

(3) The great bulk of Jesus' teaching did, indeed, relate to the resurrection of the morally dead and the quickening of them into spiritual life, but He also taught, not the resurrection of the "physical body," but the resurrection of the dead and the life beyond. He had little to say concerning the nature of the resurrection, but the fact of the resurrection He empatically taught and, above all, He demonstrated it in His resurrection from the dead. Neither did the apostles teach the resurrection of the physical body, but they did teach that we shall have immortal bodies like unto the glorified body of Jesus Christ.

In your "Hour of Prayer" department of January 19th you say: "To be like Christ is the way to heaven. To be with Him is heaven." By what rules of interpretation do you call the future home of the redeemed "heaven?" J. H. Berkley.

Monroe, Wis.

The quotation does not refer to the "future home of the redeemed." It refers to relationship to Christ, to spiritual condition. Jesus referred to himself while here as "the Son of Man, who is in heaven." No doubt, the essential feature of heave his holiness or right relation with God, but environment and association also have much to do with it.

Why does Paul in 2 Cor. 5:1 speak of our heavenly house as "not made with hands," as though our earthly house was made with hands? Dr. Jas. McComb.

The expression, "not made with hands," we take it, grows out of the use of the term "house," which in its ordinary use does refer to something made by hands. While in this passage it evidently refers to the body, the figure of a house is before his mind and gives rise to the expression referred to.

What should a church do in the case of receiving a man and his wife, both of whom have been previously married and divorced for other than scriptural reasons? An Elder.

If the parties present letters of commendation from another church and nothing is known against their moral character, they should be received on their letter. It must be assumed in such cases that the church where their membership was held has considered and passed upon the case. In case no letters are presented the church must make an original investigation of the circumstances and decide its course in the light of these and the character of those seeking membership. A little wholesome instruction from the pulpit on the subject of divorces would have a good effect in preventing these irregularities.

Current Religious Thought

The Treasury for April quotes the following emphatic language on the importance of a Christian education, in a recent address from John Henry Barrows, president of Oberlin College:

Where shall the leaders of the twentieth century be trained? In our best schools. They must come under the inspiration and guidance of the highest minds. The Christian college of the past has given America many of its greatest leaders. If we could have entered the Princeton of 140 years ago, we should have said that it scarcely deserves the rank of a grammar school. Its library was the miscellaneous refuse of cast-of theological works. Its astronomical apparatus was an orrery, its museum a few stuffed alligators. And yet this college, under the leadership of John Witherspoon, graduated during the presidency of that great divine and patriot, twenty-five congressmen, twenty senators, thirteen governors, three justices of the supreme court, one vice-President and one President, all in the space of twenty years, when the college rarely had more than a hundred students. Princeton very largely shaped our national constitution. Nine Princeton men signed the Declaration of Independence. Of the thirty-two college men in the constitutional convention nine came from Princeton. James Madison read divinity with Witherspoon before he applied his constructive mind to the fashioning of that framework of government which has been the envy and despair of European statesmen. Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Williams, Amherst, Oberlin, Knox, Beloit, Olivet, are historic names, whose disappearance would rob our better American life of much of its glory. America is now the richest of nations. Money was never so abundant. The nation never had such opportunities and obligations before, and perhaps it never had subtler and deeper perils. With agnosticism not yet extinct, with materialism penetrating like a poison the minds and hearts of the young and with the growing appetite for pleasure, it is plain that Christian education is required to meet the chief dangers of the coming century. There are serpentlike and poisonous forces in our modern civilization which no sweetness of culture will conciliate or regenerate. Culture must be re-enforced by conscience and enlivened by the Spirit of God before it will be adequate to the great problems which confront us.

In a letter to Bishop Clark, Senior Bishop in the Episcopal Church, Prof. Briggs has given the reasons for his step in uniting with that church. He says:

I have not sought refuge in the Episcopal ministry. I have made the change because I was assured that the banner of church unity was in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and nowhere else, and I have consecrated my life to that cause. If I know myself I hold to all the sacred deposit of catholic truth, in the church as well as in Holy Scripture, and I shall do all in my power to bring out that truth and maintain it.

I think we are about to enter a new age of the world, and that these things will be prominent in it—the immanence of God, the living, reigning Christ as priest and king, the presence of the indwelling Spirit in the individual and in the organism of the church; the practice of holy love, entire sanctification, the communion of saints in this world and the other world, and the reconciliation and reunion of Christ's church.

I am assured by my pupils that I make the Bible to them more real, more powerful, more divine. I have never heard ofa single one of the 1,300 theological students I have trained in the last 26 years who has said that I impaired his faith in Holy Scripture. The testimony is all the other way.

Now, if Prof. Briggs will only make it plain to us all how it is that "the banner of church unity is in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and nowhere else," he will not only have vindicated the wisdom of his ecclesiastical change, but he will have rendered a great service to the cause of unity among the people of God. If a church which cannot even invite any other Protestant minister into its pulpits, and which makes its fiction of an historic Episcopate a term of union, holds the banner of church unity, we may as well despair at once of ever seeing any such unity.

Reformation of the Nineteenth Century

NINE DECADES OF HISTORY

THE TURBULENT PERIOD.—II.

Civil War and The Christian Churches.

W. T. MOORE.

THE INFLUENCE OF LEADING MEN.

It has already been intimated that many of the leading men on both sides of the contest acted with much discretion with respect to the matters at issue. Mr. Campbell himself took no active part in the war. Though living in a Southern state, his sympathies were undoubtedly with the Union. Nevertheless, he acted with great prudence in all that he said or did during the progress of the war. At the time he was regarded by some of his Northern brethren as entirely too reticent in expressing his sympathies with the Union cause; but when it is remembered that many of his most intimate friends, as well as several of his own household, were outspoken in favor of secession, no one need wonder that Mr. Campbell did not feel called upon to become overzealous in his support of the Union. It should be remembered, also, that at this time his health began to fail. Indeed, from the year 1861 until his death he practically lived in the past. He certainly did not take cognizance of many things around him, and consequently the war, with all its ravages, had little place in his thoughts. Perhaps this was providential. Had he been in his usual health, he would no doubt have given earnest advocacy to one side or the other; and had he done so, it might have produced a division among the Disciples. As it was, his failing health excited the sympathy of his brethren on both sides of the struggle, and consequently his great personality came to be a sort of common center, where antagonistic views could meet and become reconciled.

There were other men besides Mr. Campbell who helped to stay the tide of sectional feeling. Some of the strongest Union men of the North and some of the most pronounced secessionists of the South were equally opposed to making their political differences a cause of religious disunion. Both sides held firmly that even a complete severance of the national Union ought not to compel division among the people of God. This was the view taken by probably nine hundred and ninety-nine in every thousand of the Disciples, no matter on what side of Mason and Dixion's line they resided.

It is not affirmed that no imprudent things were said or done. Doubtless there were some heated controversies, some foolish speeches, and occasionally there may have been things done in the churches or in the representative bodies that might as well have been left undone. But all this and more might have been reasonably expected. As we look back over those terrible days it is difficult to believe that anything but the grace of God in the hearts of the brethren could have kept them in practical fellowship with one another; and I think it is fitting that some of the names that were prominent in restraining passion and guiding to wise conclusions during those trying days should have special mention in any history of the period which is now under consideration.

Some, perhaps, carried their peculiar views a little too far; but no one is a competent judge of what was done at that time unless he is capable of impartially treating all the facts of the case.

THE QUESTION OF CHRISTIANS GOING TO WAR.

There were those who strongly held to the notion that Christians ought not to go to war at all, and this view was doubtless emphasized by the certainty that such a war as was then being waged would bring some of the best men in the churches face to face with one another in mortal combat. Christians, in what were known as the border states, had their fellowship more severely tried than in any other part of the country. In these states a man's foes were truly of his own household. Perhaps there was no state in the Union where brotherhood was more severely tried than in Missouri. Hence it may be interesting as well as instructive to reproduce a "Circular from the Preachers in Missouri with Respect to the Duty of Christians in this Crisis." It is as follows:

"To all the holy brethren in every state, grace and peace from God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ:—The undersigned, your brethren in the Lord, residing in the state of Missouri, in view of the present distress, which is wringing all our hearts, and the danger which threatens the churches of Christ, would submit to your prayerful consideration the following suggestions:

"(1) Whatever we may think of the propriety of bearing arms in extreme emergencies, we cannot by the New Testament, which is our only rule of discipline, justify ourselves in engaging in the fraternal strife now raging in our beloved country. To do so, therefore, would be to incur the displeasure of our blessed Lord and Savior.

"(2) It is our duty in obedience to many injunctions of Christ and the apostles, and in compliance with the last prayer of our Savior, for us to remain as we have thus far so happily continued, a united body. But this cannot be if, in accordance with our prejudices and political opinions, we join in this deadly strife. Is not the 'unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace' more to be desired than all that could possibly be gained by such a strife, attended as it must be by the loss of this unity and the reign of passion in our hearts?

"(3) Knowing, as all history teaches and as the experience of many of us can testify, that active military service almost invariably destroys the religious character of Christians who are drawn into it, we cannot discharge our duty to Christ, if we see our young brethren rushing into this vortex of almost certain ruin, without an earnest and affectionate remonstrance,

"(4) If we remain true to this line of duty, not allowing the temptations of the time, however enticing or however threatening they may be, to turn us aside, we shall be able greatly to glorify the name of our Lord, who is the Prince of Peace. For we may present to our countrymen, when restored to their right mind by the return of peace, a body of disciples so closely bound by the Word of God alone that even the shock of Civil War nor the alarm produced by religious systems crumbling around could divide us. How rapid and glorious in that event would be the subsequent triumph of truth throughout the whole land! This heavenly triumph is clearly within our reach. If we fail to grasp it, how unworthy we shall prove of the holy cause we plead!

"(5) We are striving to restore to an unhappy and sectarianized world the primitive doctrine and discipline. Then let us pursue that peaceful course to which we know that Jesus and the apostles would advise us if they were living once more and here among us. Let us for Jesus' sake endeavor in this appropriate hour to restore the love of peace which he inculcated; which was practiced by the great body of the church for the first three hundred years, in an utter refusal to do military service; which continued to be thus practiced by the true church throughout the dark ages, and which has been so strongly plead by many of the purest men of modern times, our own Bro. A. Campbell among the number.

"(6) We conclude by entreating the brethren everywhere to study exclusively 'the things which make for peace, and those by which one may edify another.' And 'the very God of peace sanctify you wholly,' and 'the peace of God which passeth all understanding keep your minds and hearts through Jesus Christ.'"

"Note.—There are several other well-known brethren in the state whose sentiments, we have good reasons to believe, accord with those expressed above, but whose signatures we have thus far failed to obtain. I subjoin this explanation, lest from the absence of particular names any might infer an opposition to the sentiments of this address."

J. W. McG.

It will be readily conceded that the names signed to this paper must have given its utterances great weight. They were among the most influential preachers of the state, and it is safe to say that this declaration of Christian feeling, whether wisely conceived or not from a political point of view, had a salutary effect upon the brethren of the state in restraining them from following the rebellion; and in any case it did much to call attention to the religious side of the issues and thereby saved many, no doubt, from extreme conduct.

At the time this circular was issued, it was believed by many Unionists that it favored secession, but time has shown that its influence was wholly in the opposite direction; so that even if its original intention was to promote the secesssion cause, it evidently failed to produce the desired effect. But there is no reason to believe that the signers of this circular had any other end in view than that of restraining passion and promoting brotherly love.

THE WAR QUESTION IN THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

There were, however, some restless spirits on both sides who believed that war was a perfectly legitimate way with which to settle such a question as was then before the country. Naturally enough those on the Union side felt that it was no time to hide loyalty under a bushel, and consequently they were anxious to have the whole of our brotherhood, as far as possible, thoroughly committed in support of the Federal government. The General Missionary Convention, which at that time met annually in Cincinnati, was the only really representative body among the Disciples. At its meeting, Oct. 24, 1861, Dr. J. P. Robinson, of Ohio, offered the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with the loyal and patriotic in our country in the present efforts to sustain the government of the United States, and we feel it our duty as Christians to ask our brethren everywhere to do all in their power to sustain the proper and constitutional authorities of the Union."

This resolution was seconded by Dr. L. L. Pinkerton, of Kentucky, and was then laid over until the afternoon session. In the afternoon Dr. Robinson having called up his resolution, D. S. Burnet raised the question whether, in view of the second article of the constitution, it was in order to entertain such a resolution in that body.

The acting chairman, Isaac Errett, of Michigan, decided that the resolution was in order; whereupon John Smith, of Kentucky, moved an appeal from the decision of the chair to the house. However, this appeal was withdrawn, but was afterwards renewed by R. M. Bishop, of Ohio, when the appeal was sustained; and, consequently, the resolution was declared out of order. Dr. Pinkerton then moved that the society take a recess for ten minutes. This was agreed to.

During this recess an informal meeting was called, with D. S. Burnet in the chair, when, after a few remarks from Col. J. A. Garfield, Dr. Robinson's resolution was passed with but one negative vote.

It should also be stated that all the speakers upon the point of order and upon the appeal from the decision of the chair had, before the adjournment, avowed that the resolution expressed their sentiments. They opposed its introduction in the convention wholly on the ground that it was unconstitutional and ought not, therefore, to be entertained.

Doubtless some may have been influenced, partially at least, by the notion that the passage of such a resolution by the convention at that time might have a tendency to alienate brethren whose relations were already under a very heavy strain.

FINAL ACTION OF THE CONVENTION.

These considerations, however, did not hold for any length of time. Two years after this, at the annual meeting of the society, Oct. 22, the following preamble and resolutions offered by R. Faurot were adopted with very few dissenting votes:

"WHEREAS, 'There is no power but of God,' and 'the powers that be are ordained of God;' and whereas, we are commanded in the Holy Scriptures to be subject to the powers that be, and 'obey magistrates;' and whereas, an armed rebellion exists in our country, subversive of these divine injunctions; and whereas, reports have gone abroad that we, as a religious body, and particularly as a missionary society, are to a certain degree disloyal to the government of the United States: therefore—

"Resolved, That we unqualifiedly declare our allegiance to said government, and repudiate as false and slanderous any statements to the contrary.

"Resolved, That we tender our sympathies to our brave and noble soldiers in the field who are defending us from the attempts of armed traitors to overthrow our government, and also to those bereaved and rendered desolate by the ravages of war.

"Resolved, That we will earnestly and constantly pray to God to give to our legislators and rulers wisdom to enact and power to execute such laws as will speedily bring to us the enjoyment of a peace that God will deign to bless."

A motion was made to adjourn and lost. The question was then raised by a member, J. W. McGarvey, of Kentucky, whether the resolutions were in order or not. The chair, Isaac Errett, again presiding, decided that, according to a vote of the house two years ago, the resolutions were not in order and he should, therefore, so hold, although contrary to his own clear convictions. An appeal to the house was taken from this decision, which appeal being discussed, was sustained. It was then moved that the society adjourn. The motion was lost. It was then moved that the resolutions be laid on the table. This motion was also lost.

The previous question was then called for, and the vote of the house sustained the call.

The preamble and resolutions were finally adopted, with very few dissenting.

It ought to be stated, however, in justice to those who urged the necessity of taking this action, that they did so wholly on the ground of loyalty to the government, but they distinctly disavowed any sentiment that could be legitimately construed to mean alienation from or disfellowship with their Southern brethren. Indeed, they held that their views with respect to their maintenance of the Federal Union only emphasized their desire to perpetuate their spiritual union with those of their brethren who were in the Southern Confederacy.

At this same meeting of the society the report of the board of managers contained a very graphic reference to the fratricidal war which was then at its height. The report was written by D. S. Burnet, who was at that time corresponding secretary of the society. A paragraph is worth reproducing. It is as follows:

"The disaster of the nineteenth century has come, which white-haired sire and fair-browed son prayed never to see. But it has come, like some splendid and blighting comet, driving commerce and trade from their channels and the blood out of our hearts. The world gazes on the scene aghast, and the religion of Christ made for man, not knowing his distinctions of tribe and nation nor his ocean and mountain boundaries, visits alike the field golden with harvest or incarnadine with human gore, and still brings her pardon-bearing mercy to all. Our work, then, is unchanged except by the difficulties which it is the victory of faith to overcome. Many of our churches have been represented on the great battle-fields in the struggle for the integrity of the Union, and several of our preachers have followed their flock through the dangers which environed them on the field of slaughter, ministering caution to the living and comfort to the dying, while we all have prayed that God would hide us from the evil till the storm be past, and that he would so guide that storm that when the cloud of war lifted, the temple of free constitutional government would stand unscathed, revealing its beauty and strength and proportions unshorn for our posterity, as we received it from our fathers. Recognizing our religious obligation in its maintenence, let us address ourselves to the duty of lifting higher the banner of the cross and carrying it farther than ever before."

This extract shows the spirit of the men who were at that time most actively engaged in maintaining the cause. All letters from evangelists in the field as well as reports from the state societies, during these days, have in them a sad note, if not something very discouraging. The general society was itself practically bankrupt. It had assumed obligations when it relied upon support from the South, and now that this support was entirely cut off, it was with difficulty that these obligations could be met. Nevertheless, the good work did not stop. Many new men came to the rescue, while most of the old contributors, who were within reach of the society, gave liberally to its support.

Nevertheless, these were trying years for the missionary cause. Apart from the difficulty of securing financial aid there was a general depression of spiritual interest throughout the whole country. The war fever had seriously affected the whole body spiritual, and consequently it is not at all strange that missionary enthusiasm was not at a very high tide.

ORGANIZATION.*

(CONCLUDED.)

I wish to make the statement, and I trust I have your unqualified appproval, that nine out of every ten church troubles grow out of a lack of organization. Organization is one of the first things to do, yet we oftenest assume position in any given sphere of action, move on in a disorderly way, regardless of system or plan or design or real intention, only to be doing something. Doing is a dangerous thing when only disorder ensues. We ought to know that all activity is not industry, that all doing is not accomplishment, and that all busy-ness is not work. We must differentiate, we must specialize, we must centralize:

I wish to specialize further, with reference to specialization. For example, in every church each department should be organizational rather than institutional. It should be a part of the whole instead of independent of it. Let me give you an outline of a well-organized church.

1. The ministry is the pastoral department of the church.

2. The Bible-school is the educational department of the church.

3. The Christian Endeavor and the Junior is the training department of the church.

4. The Sunday services and the prayer-meeting is the devotional department of the church.

5. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions is the missionary department of the church.

6. The finance is the stock department of the church.

7. The officiary is the executive department of the church.

Good organization means that just so far as possible each department should have its special features, and any person needing that which the department can supply should be in it and actively employed.

But sad as it is true, this organizational feature is sadly misunderstood. I have known auxiliaries run upon such independent lines that so far as the church was concerned, of which the members were a part, the little institution might have been located in Africa so far as any good to the church was concerned.

Again, I have seen in some localities a big independent Sunday-school running upon an institutional track, but on looking for the church of God, I did not find it.

Sometimes the official board represents a positive episcopacy, developing a clan of little popes, or one huge pope and several cardinals. There are some C. E. Societies which run upon the basis of some secret order, so completely independent of any other department of the church, that if anybody were to ask about them the answer would be, "I do not know what they are doing." The pastor sometimes has to say, "I learned sometime ago to mind my own business."

Perhaps there is nothing over which the church suffers more than the lofty position of independence assumed by the financial department. It has relation to nothing but gold. There are moneyed parties who take the bit between their teeth and assure the pulic that "this church is run on a money basis." The so-called "strong men" in some churches are the moneyed men. Sometimes this feature is so disastrous that the church dies of dry rot, because there is nothing in it but money. I am reminded of what Jesus said, "And to the angel of the church of the Laodiceans write: These things saith the Amen, the faithful and the true witness, the beginning of the creation of God; I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot. I would thou were cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth. Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked; I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thin eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see."

Church organization implies a great deal.

1. It means that there must be a very high grade of preachers.

It is not enough that the preacher rubs against the college wall four years, until his coat is worn shiny with the contact, and his ordination papers smell of the odor of the shop. He must be a man, who like those of old were from infancy selected and by training were fitted as companions for the king. They should be like the men who accompanied the first king of Israel, of whom it was said, "There went out with him a band of men whose hearts God had touched."

They should be men of brawn and brain, of training and culture, of capacity and reserve, of daring and courage, of piety and love. Men who can lead by their intrinsic worth. Men of whom it may be said, "There was a man sent from God whose name was—(Jones) (Smith) (Brown). A man who esteems the divine idea of preaching, who leans upon God and dares to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. Such a man should be retained by the church for unlimited years. One of our weakest points is the lack of organization in retaining our pastors. We have a great number of good men whose ability to serve the church has never been fully developed, because they have had to leave before their work was half done. This ruinous, yearling system of disorganized, chaotic iniquity! Oh, when will it cease? Why will we waste so much time and energy?

2. Organization in the church means a trained and a consecrated eldership and deaconship. That the officers should be consecrated men, passes without saying. But I wish to urge the necssity of training men for this most important trust. I insist upon it that it is as essential for the elders and deacons to be trained, as much so as the preacher of the gospel. "Let them also first be proved," said the apostle. And haven't we had enough experience in nearly all of our churches to prove at least the weakness in this department? There should be enough men upon the board to oversee and possibly superintend the various departments, so there may be a subdivision of labor. When each department is reported at the monthly meeting, the counsel of the combined officiary can hardly fail of a proper adjustment of difficulties or the provision for new work.

3. Better organization implies methods of training in the C. E. Societies. It should be the training-place, first in the Junior and then continued in the Senior for elders, deacons, pastors, missionaries, evangelists, Sunday-school superintendents and teachers, presidents of auxiliaries, church treasurers, clerks, etc. It should be the normal of the church, the gymnasium of the human spirit. Dr. Emerson said, "The way to train up a child in the way he should go is to begin one hundred years before he is born." while we may not apply this rule absolutely, the principle of it is good, for ideas of church life should be put into the minds of the little ones in the Junior Society, and even the Senior Society should make it a point to have a large number of associate members under training just so far as possible before they are born into the kingdom.

4. Better organization implies that the missionary function be placed entirely in the hands of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. First, have it understood that the auxiliary is a part of the church, not distinct from it, but an essential part of it. It should superintend and conduct all of the missionary enterprises of the church. This is its especial work. Don't you know, dear brethren, that the C. W. B. M. is the best organized missionary enterprise in the world? Don't you know they could handle this question for Foreign, for State, for Church Extension, Ministerial Relief, every form of missionary or benevolent work, better than any class of men living? I would modestly suggest to the bishops and deacons of this assembly to go home and invite the sisters to serve the Lord's body in this respect.

5. Better organization implies that the Bible-school shall BE a Bible-school. There is a dangerous tendency in some quarters of making the so-called Sunday-school a place of entertainment for the young. It should be the place where the BIBLE is the text-book, a knowledge of its contents the aim in every class. There should be graded classes, and by all means a MEMORY CLASS for memorizing the Scriptures and becoming familiar with the Bible, the Book of books. A man is not an efficient workman who is not familiar with his tools. So the Christian must KNOW the Bible as a tool with which to manufacture Christians. Every member of the church needs to be in the school. It is the educational department.

6. Better organization implies that the Lord's day services and the prayer-meeting shall be strictly DEVOTIONAL. A church is not well organized when members are not worshipful. There is nothing so vital to the Christian as the cultivation of the heart. And the place of worship is the altar on which the offering is presented to God. It is the place to organize the heart.

This method of worship should be uniform with every-day practice. The apostle tells us (Heb. 3:12): "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God. But exhort one another daily, while it is called to-day; lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. And let us consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works: not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another: and so much the more as ye see the day approaching."

I think the prayer-meeting should be organized. Topics and leaders should be appointed months in advance, so that the people may have time and opportunity to prepare to stand before God. Worship should be a pleasure and not an irksome duty. The spirit of devotion should be so prominent that the Christian shall be growing in grace and knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. He will then cheerfully say, "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go unto the house of the Lord." The people are there to worship God, and not the preacher or anything else.

7. Better organization implies that the question of finance shall be a religious question. It is an act of worship when a man understands that he is to lay by him in store as God hath prospered him and pay it in the Lord's treasury on the Lord's day. It is a grave question, this finance question, when we consider that we are dealing with God. He who pays takes stock in the divine exchange.

It is not good diplomacy to fish for men who have fat pocketbooks and not consecrated hearts. And we should not measure our financial strength by the wealthy men, but by the self-denying offerings of the godly. Every member of the congregation who is indifferent to this grace is in need of education. Put him in the Junior Society and train him to give. He is a very small infant and needs special care.

The question of finance in the church should have a special department, with trained men and women in it to make it go. It is a good plan to take a pledge from every member of the church, upon the weekly plan, and have a monthly report of the condition of both members and treasury. Church treasuries will always be active and money will be abundant for all purposes if we serve God in this work on business principles. Business is business, whether you are serving God or any other man.

But you say, "Your talk has been upon the question of local church organizataion." True, but what other thing is there to organize.

Whatever may be needed in organizing should be upon the same plan. Introduction of anything that will not build up the church is disorganization and should not be tolerated. The Church of Christ is a unit, whether in one congregation or one thousand congregations, so when I have called attention to the congregation at Red Oak, I have spoken for Shenandoah, for Clarinda, for Mt. Ayr and Des Moines. We ought to have learned by this time that congregationalism is not Christianity and that when the body is healthy and helpful, there is no schism in the parts.

"But how shall we locate the preachers?" etc. "And what shall we do with discipline?" What will you need in locating preachers? If Red Oak keeps her preacher ten years,andShenandoah keeps hers twenty years, and Clarinda keeps hers forty years, there will be no need of an appointing board, for the churches will be so well organized that they will be capable of calling a man without help when their pastors die.

But you may ask me a thousand questions as to missionary societies, colleges, benevolent institutions, state and county and district work. I will not promise to answer all questions, but I am aware of this, that if our local churches are well organized, other matters will be well taken care of.

THE ESSENCE OF LIFE.

GEO. T. SMITH.

Every trade, every science,has its idioms. Christianity forms no exception. Language must be changed to convey its meaning. That was true of the Greek, it is the necessity to-day in the East.

When Jesus says, "This is life eternal, that they should know thee, the only true God, and him whom thou didst send even Jesus Christ," the word "know" is the crucial word. Psychologists make a distinction between knowledge of acquaintance, and knowledge about any thing or person. Knowledge about is the deeper. No mere acquaintance with the revelation of God is eternal life. To know a person, an intimate fellowship, an entrance into sympathy with him is essential. When Paul says, "I know whom I have believed," a lifetime of rich and deep experience lies behind that knowledge.

Therefore Jesus says, "If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." "If ye know these things blessed are ye if ye do them." Doing is a prerequisite to true knowledge, these are two steps to eternal life. Read the Campbell and Owen Debate, and you will have an opinion that Christianity is true, believe in your heart that God raised Jesus from the dead, then confess that faith with your mouth and you will know, your being will thrill with the rapturous knowledge. The truth is known only as it is done, thus it becomes a part of life.

Jesus did not despise testimony. He never taught by mere personal authority. "My doctrine is not mine." If he were alone in bearing testimony it would be of no value, but he immediately adds that he is not alone. He then gives that magnificent line of proof, in the fifth chapter of John, beginning with the greatest of the prophets, and ending with the earliest, four lines of evidence besides his own word.

Knowledge is unlimited. We are too easily satisfied. An intense thirst for knowledge ought to seize us, drive us to the fountains of wisdom. "That ye may be filled with the knowledge of his will," was Paul's prayer for Christians whom he had never seen.

Knowledge and action are the two legs which carry us to the most difficult and most important of all, that is being. It is easier to know than to do, easier to do than to be. But this is the citadel. This is the man. This is life.

What are we to be? Perfect. Nothing less. We cannot be saved without it. Without spot or wrinkle we must be presented to God "We cannot reach it." No, but he can. He will present us faultless. Life, eternal life, is a matter of degrees. The Pharisees were religious, but so far from the true knowledge of God that Jesus pronounced them dead. Every sin is death. He who lies is dead to truth. He who hates is dead to love. The least sin paralyzes some portion of our nature.

In being the Christian is to combine the most composite traits. He is to be strong, yet gentle. He is to be gentle, yet zealous. He must love and he must hate. He must be insistant in season and out of season, yet be patient. He must be a soldier, yet live peaceably with all men so far as possible. He must be just, yet merciful.

In being we place the heart of eternal life. What we are determines our heaven. Knowledge and action bring us to being. To be—such a man as Christ would have me. Oh, how futile seem my prayers and efforts, he points so far ahead!

In walking one foot steps farther than the other. If you have a hundred yards of clear pavement and start, without thinking in a straight line, you will find that you have swerved either to the right or the left. Hence, men lost in the woods describe a circle. So either knowledge or action will be emphasized by each reader. Not many Americans lay too strong stress on knowledge, we are not a thought nation. "The craze for numbers" (may it never die), is an ungracious criticism on the strong desire for quantity, which may be at the expense of quality. But this paper is wandering. Crystallize knowledge into golden deeds; by the deeper knowledge thus obtained rise to a greater sphere of being; from the higer position widen knowledge; precipitate that into solid action; thus come into closer and closer fellowship with him who is our life.

SCENES IN THE TROPICS;

OR, TRUTH, LOVE AND BEAUTY.

I. Truth.

BY LESLIE COLLINS.

TO MY FATHER:—We are in the land of sunshine—"blessed sunshine;" where flowers never fade, and the grass is evergreen. Yes, this is the favored spot—the charming clime; where fair Queen Summer sways the land, and sweet maid Poetry captivates. In this domain no tyrant Winter's chilling winds invade; no terrible retreats from Moscow; no Beauty born to bloom in springtime and die in the arms of Autumn; but all is fair save where the mists—those mists that "roll in splendor," flit across the good Queen's mind, and powers above bid her weep the tears of heaven. But soon she rallies, and the sunshine sifting, drifting through the clouds, fall as smiles penetrating tears, and long ere the damp on her cheeks is dried, she breaks forth in merry sounds of rippling laughter. The feasts are then renewed; the gaiety resumed, and the world is happy. How quick, how sudden and sublime the changes in the tropics! Last night when we arrived I dared not look upon her brow, for she was sad and weeping; but scarce ere the midnight she forgot her sorrow, and came forth arrayed in the gown of lovely twilight.

This morning she surprised me more. Her even temper and her gentle manners; her splendid presence, and her excellent sunshine fascinated. We communed together and she spoke to me of love. Every beauty of her features, every look and every charm whispered to my heart a rythm and a melody divine. O! resplendent summer, charming and delightful spell; thy majestic radiance and thy dazzling brilliancy; they imperial robes and thy attractive verdure ever lure me on. Art, beauty, grandeur, loveliness—sublime inspire, and under the strain my breast swells within poetic passion; the fires within the forges of my soul glow brightly. The music commences; but above all the melodies I hear one air, one simple tune, and I strike the chord and sing: "There is sunshine in my soul to-day," and the harmony dies with, "Blessed sunshine, blessed sunshine" ringing in my ears.

Just a few moments ago it was night. I lay upon the deck dreaming at the stars. The silence was profound. The quaint old Island City, far across the little bay, with its dim and moving lights, seemed the only thing alive. The sea was still—still as a peaceful lake; not a billow; not a ripple broke the gloss, and not a motion of the boat, but all was calm. The breezes like sleeping sentinels slept at their posts. Occasionally one would arouse itself long enough to exclaim: "All's well," and then die away to dreams. The moon—the beautiful moon—that most bewitching sister of our mother earth—that meek and modest daughter of the skies—whose long nights of never-tiring vigils have made her famous the wide world round, I know not where she was, perhaps she had tarried too long in some heavenly bower, perhaps she had gone on some ministering mission to the stars; or perchance whirled out into space, with a commission from the sun to bring back some reckless, wayward, wandering comet; anyway, her absence was divine. And the starlight was serene. At certain intervals, a light from the lighthouse on the rocks flashed out across the placid waters a saluting message to some passing stranger, or blazed a welcome signal to a home coming mariner. Suddenly athwart the eastern skies a faint light glimmered for awhile, and then grew denser. The stars faded. The sea seemed surprised. The winds awoke with a start, and, amusing as it was, some stupid, half-awake zephyr tried to salute their approaching commander. But it was too late. Night had vanished; day had dawned and the sun was up. Nature was aroused, all life was renewed, and graceful seagulls winged their easy flights around our little yacht. Beyond the bay and beyond the beach smiled the verdant woods. Between us and them the silver waters gleamed; the "golden sands" glared in the rays, and all along the shores half "naked negroes" ran pantingly into the arms of Neptune.

The weird city in the distance looked the only thing unconscious—and why not, after its inhabitants dissipate the long nights in revelry, debauched by Bacchus? And I said, "Father, this is a Truth:"

"The naked negro, panting at the line,
Boasts of his golden sands and palmy wine,
Basks in the glare, or stems the tepid wave,
And thanks his gods for all the good they gave."

Our Budget.

—Children's Day, June 4th.

—There are no anti-missionary children.

—Give the little ones a chance and they will pour out their hoarded pennies for the conversion of the heathen.

—We hear good news from the Jubilee Offering for Home Missions. If any church has failed so far to make the offering, it is not too late yet to join the procession.

—The last week's issue of the Christian Oracle was a Children's Day number. It has an illustrated cover and is a thing of beauty. We understand an extra edition has been printed of the number in order to supply the demand beyond its regular subscription list.

—Children's Day was first observed in 1881. In that year 168 schools observed it, and gave $750. Last year 3,180 schools observed Children's Day, and they gave $34,334. Since Children's Day was inaugurated the Sunday-schools have given $291,304. Last year 27 Sunday-schools raised $100 or more.

—Illinois led last year in the number of schools observing Children's Day. The number was 374. The Sunday-schools in Ohio led in their offerings for Heathen Missions. The amount given was $5,444. The Sunday-schools of Christendom give about a million dollars a year for missions. The children of the Methodist Episcopal Church alone give about $250,000 annually.

—Children's Day for Heathen Missions the first Sunday in June.

—Let the preachers preach a suitable sermon May 28th or June 4th on the origin, purpose and growth of Children's Day.

—The Children's Day offering should be sent promptly Monday morning, June 5th, to F. M. Rains, treasurer, box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio. Please give the local name of the school when different from the post office.

—The Sunday-schools are asked for $40,000 this year. We now have reason to believe they will give this amount. If they give as much as $40,000, we are reasonably certain of raising $150,000 for Foreign Missions this year.

—The Christian ministers of Kansas City and vicinity hold a banquet on June 2nd, and have arranged a very interesting program for the occasion. It is a fifty cents per plate banquet, but the price has no political significance in this case.

—We owe a debt to the children. If they are trained in unselfishness now, the results will be seen in the future churches. The schools of to-day will be the churches of to-morrow. If we train the children up with large vision and broad sympathies, they will make generous and useful church members.

—At the recent installation of the Rev. Alexander M'Giffen as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn, New York, Dr. Henry Van Dyke preached. He urged the new pastor to be a preacher, not a lecturer on philosophy, theology, poetry, literature or politics; but to preach the Word of God. He told the new pastor that he must set forth the spiritual life, and that alone. He said there was a certain kind of theology whose doctrines he must avoid as being barren of spirituality.

—We give our readers, this week, a picture of one of our missionaries in the foreign field, William Remfry Hunt, of Nankin, China. Bro. Hunt is an Englishman, and went from England to the Foreign Mission field. He is one of the men, we believe, who were trained at the West London Tabernacle, and were sent out by our Foreign Christian Missionary Society. He visited this country last autumn and attended our National Convention at Chattanooga. His contributions to our literature indicate both ability and intellectual training, all of which he has consecrated to mission work.

—An Agnostic sends us a little pamphlet in which he sets forth his reasons (?) for not believing in God. He argues that men have always made their gods in their own likeness. "The gods are always after the order and in the image of those who worship them." How came it that the emancipated Hebrew slaves, just out of Egypt, conceived of a God of infinite righteousness and holiness? Why is it that the whole of Christendom to-day, with all its wars, its avarice, its lust, its divisions, acknowledges a God of peace, of love, of spotless purity and pays divine honors to One who revealed God as at war with those evils which Christians even sometimes practice? Why will not even an Agnostic open his eyes to facts?

—In the last issue of our esteemed contemporary, Literature, we notice an article on a new punctuation mark proposed by the French novelist, Alcanter de Brahms, and believe the suggestion worthy of consideration. But instead of a "conventionalized flatiron," as a red flag for irony, we would suggest a clearly defined illustration of an augur (heroic size), which would be more appropriate for thick skulls than a flatiron. It would be as fitting to place under one of Rosa Bonheur's pictures, "This is a Horse," or one of Mark Twain's witticisms, "This is a Joke," as to put a trademark upon irony. If the readers of Dean Swift and like writers are of such small mental calibre that they cannot discover irony when it is intended, we would suggest that said readers would confine themselves to Mother Goose and classics of that nature.

—To our County Bible-school Superintendents, Greeting, with Good News:—I am rejoiced to say to you, that the Keystone View Company of this city, managed by brethren who delight in the Lord's work, especially in the Bible-school feature of it, have authorized me to say that they will present to the county Bible-school superintendent making the best report at the Plattsburg convention, an elegant $12.50 parlor set, consisting of 50 most excellent views from all parts of the world, describing various features of life, nature, history, etc., and a handsome sycamore stereoscope, and a fine sixteenth century cabinet in which to keep them, and not to be outdone by such Christian kindness, I will give a similar set to the superintendent making the second best report. Here is your opportunity for doing good in the Lord's work and being very handsomely complimented for it, and I believe that those seeing the set will bear me out in urging every county superintendent to seek this worthy honor. H. F. Davis.

St. Louis May 22, 1899.

—The worst enemies of the Bible now are not the Higher Critics, but a class of hysterical preachers and writers who tell the public that all these scholarly men have rejected the inspiration of the Bible. The Rev. Dr. DeCosta, of New York, rector in the Episcopal Church, prepared a sermon against the ordination of Prof. Briggs which he was unable to deliver, because of his emotion, but he had it printed in part, and here is an extract from it:

There is now no question about the future attitude of the Episcopal Church with respect to the Bible. The Scriptures are no longer to be enforced as an infallible guide. The church has relaxed the appearance of authority and may now be governed by individual caprice.

The result follows from further issues, ending with the Brooks case. Another "case" has now been literally forced upon the church, arraying the students in two hostile camps. Hitherto sacred places are illuminated by the reflected light of pagan altar fires.

Belief in the Bible as the inspired work of God is a "fundamental doctrine." If this doctrine is impugned, so are the doctrines generally of the whole church.

Such a Jeremiad as that from a preacher does more harm to the Bible than all the infidel attacks on it, because it makes the impression on those who know no better, that even devout scholars have surrendered the Bible as of no authority.

—Children's Day should be thoroughly announced, not only in the schools, but in the pulpits, and when practicable in the local press.

—Dr. B. B. Tyler's treatment of Dr. Barclay and the Jerusalem mission in the Historical Series was admirable in every way.—N. M. Ragland, Fayetteville, Ark.

—We print, this week, the second installment of Bro. Moore's contribution to the history of our movement for the past half century. Dr. Moore requests us to state that if any who read these articles can add any incident or fact of historical value, for the period of the war, to write him concerning the matter at Columbia.

—The power to set the heart right, to renew the springs of action, comes from Christ. The sense of the infinite worth of the single soul and the recoverableness of a man at his worst are the gifts of Christ. The freedom from guilt, the forgiveness of sins, come from Christ's cross; the hope of immortality springs from Christ's grave.—Prof. Drummond

How infinite, then, are our obligations to Christ! What are we doing to discharge that debt, or even manifest our gratitude?

—In a very able baccalaureate sermon, delivered at Paris, Mo., last Sunday evening, by W. N. Briney, pastor Christian Church in that place, as printed in the Republic, he said:

Character is not the result of a fortuitous combination of circumstances. It is never an accident. In a world where God rules there can be no such thing as luck. Effects invariably result from causes. Since God flung from his plastic fingers this beautiful world, and set it swinging in its orbit about the sun, there has never been an accident in it. When men speak of a thing occurring by chance they do not assert the absence of a cause, but confess their ignorance of it. Be your character good or bad, it is not so by accident. It is what you have made it. No man is at the mercy of circumstances he cannot control. Character makes circumstance, not circumstance character. As a man governs his shadow, so character makes circumstance. No man should be the victim of circumstance, but its master. By the power of purpose it is possible to gain the victory.

—C. E. Morgan's sermon at Central Christian Church, Sunday morning, was on Paul's declaration, "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." Referring to the power of Paul's personality he said:

Paul had a way of sweeping aside conventionalities and accidentals and incidentals and ritualisms and legalisms and all nonessential, unimportant things and coming at once to the center of the matter. Whenever he attempted a survey of the Christian system, Jesus Christ, the crucified, was always the corner stone. He ran all his lines from this center. He was the Copernicus among the theologians. There have been many Ptolemys who have taken some planetary doctrine and have tried to have the sun revolve around it. This accounts for many of the divisions of Christendom. Man having little sense of perspective, to whom all doctrines look the same size, standing out equally at the front, take one another of them and make a corner stone on which to build a church. When will these divisions be healed? When we all, with Paul, take Christ as the center of Christianity—when we all build on this divine foundation.

—The Christian Endeavor World tells the following story of a man who borrowed a medical work to read up on appendicitis, a disease of which he had an unreasoning terror. The man is supposed to tell his own story:

I read it and reread it, and as I did so it seemed to me that some of the premonitory signs coincided exactly with certain aches and pains I had felt for several days. I got alarmed at once, and that night was panic-stricken by a severe cramp a little northeast of my right hipbone. That I knew to be the fatal spot, and needless to say, I din't sleep a wink.

By morning I had all the symptoms of a typical case, and could scarcely get around to see the doctor. I began to tell him my story, when he stopped me. "How do you come to know so much about the disease?" he asked. I replied promptly that I had been reading up on it. "You have!" he replied. "Well, you get right out of this office, and don't waste any more of my time!"

Then he explained that every medical student always has all the diseases on record, in regular order, just as he studies them, and I began to feel better. I went home, returned the book, and am now entirely out of danger, thank you!

—Bro. T. R. Hodkinson's experience in C.-E. entitled "The Evolution of a Disciple," is a brilliant production and ought to be put in tract form.—A. Martin, Ashland, O.

We think so, too. Is not this the general sentiment?

—The next six weeks will decide whether or not Add-Ran shall live or die. The emergency calls for one or more large-hearted, Christian-spirited men who have the Christian patriotism to save our university. Where are the men?—John Ferguson, in Christian Courier.

So it is in every state where we have a college. The cry is, "Help, or we perish." We trust the Texas brotherhood will not allow the fate of Add-Ran to remain in doubt very long.

—Dr. Noble, of the Union Park Congregational Church, Chicago, preached last Lord's day on "Heresy in Our Congregational Churches and How to Deal With it." Among the auditors were nearly all the trustees of the Chicago Theological Seminary. Among other things the Doctor is reported as saying:

Charges of heresy ought not to be preferred against any man, whether in pulpit, college, seminary or editor's chair, on grounds less grave than certainty of wide departure from some commonly accepted and fundamental truth of the Christian system. Mere suspicion of unsoundness should have no place in our dealings with men who are clothed with the responsibility of preaching and teaching the word of life and who give credible testimony of their sincerity and honesty of purpose. Mischief, serious and lasting, is sometimes done by preachers and teachers who shrewdly suggest ideas and opinions which they do not deem it prudent to openly avow. So mischief, serious and lasting, is not infrequently done by just intimating—not openly declaring, but just insinuating—that some preacher or teacher is not loyal to the truth as it is in Jesus. This course is not manly. It violates all canons of charity, it stirs bad blood and it limits usefulness. To fill the air with these hints—especially if with a serpentlike cunning they are dropped into the ears of the newspaper reporter—gives one a temporary advertising and helps him to a kind of notoriety that is equivocal, but in the long run it hinders influence for good and sets things back rather than forward. Were all of the questions of religion and biblical inquiry settled it would be different, but these questions are not all settled, and our ministers, our professors and our writers must be assured of elbow room enough in their studies to work without the fear of molestation. And this same liberty extended to men who as the result of their studies and investigations venture to champion views not generally held to be orthodox ought to be accorded to those who are solicitous lest the views thus advanced and championed do harm. The history of the church is not without instances—a good many of them—of men who were suspected of being dangerously out of the way and in consequence were persecuted, often to the death, when their real offense was that they were dangerously in the way and had their hands fixed on the eternal verities of the Son of God. These men who guard the truths of religion are alarmed, and they have a right to be alarmed and must be tolerated in their alarm. It is easy to cry, "Heresy," and it is also easy to cry, "Heresy hunter," and the one may be just as unjust and wicked as the other.

English Topics.

A FAR-REACHING EVIL.

I want just to throw on a certain subject one of those sidelights which are often more useful than direct illumination. We are here in England constantly talking and writing about priestcraft and ritualism, for these are amongst the devil's most potent agencies for corrupting the national life. But there are many people who make light of the Pope and popery, for they assume that Giant Despair, as John Bunyan called the Pope, can now only sit mumbling in his own moldy den. One of the most esteemed English clergymen of the day is the Rev. Dr. Robertson, the English chaplain in Venice. Many Americans must have made his acquaintance when in Italy. He is a delightful preacher and a noted writer on Italy. Just at this time he is publishing in weekly chapters a most instructive description of Romanism as it now prevails. His chapter this week is the most impressive of all as yet; for it brings home to us what are some of the effects of the numerous perversions of late years of members of our English nobility to Rome. One of the most trusted and one of very ablest of Mr. Gladstone's colleagues was Lord Ripon. The Marquis of Ripon was a leader of the great Liberal party in its palmy days a quarter of a century ago. He was made governor-general of India, and as the British vicar he won golden opinions. When he went over to Rome the incident produced a most painful impression. One consequence was that he soon took his place amongst the many extinct volcanoes in our political world. But he took, and still in his old age does take, a very active part for the Pope in the movements of the day; and as we all know, the most agitating currents of public thought now are the religious. Dr. Robertson tells us from Italy something of what an English aristocrat can do for mischief in aid of the Pope.

A STRANGE MONASTIC STORY.

When Garibaldi and Mazzini set Italy free and it became one united nation under King Victor Immanuel, with Rome for its capital, then the suppression of the monasteries and nunneries was decreed throughout the length and breadth of the land. The government took possession of all the monastic buildings in the land, declaring them to be, like the churches, national property. The different orders were dissolved and the creation of new monks and nuns was declared to be illegal. At the same time the life interest of existing monks and nuns was secured by allowing them to remain in the convents until reduced by death or other causes to a certain number, when the remaining inmates were removed to another convent where there were more, and the government took possession of the property. In this way some 3,000 monasteries have fallen into the hands of the government and a very few remain to fall in. The buildings for the most part have been turned into hospitals, barracks and public schools. "But I have often asked," says Dr. Robertson, "since this is the case, how is it that there are still so many monasteries in Italy?" The explanation is full of interest. In some cases a certain number of monks or nuns are allowed to remain, when the building is exceedingly beautiful and is considered worthy to be regarded as a national monument or showplace. Sometimes the government has no use for a convent when it falls in, and it is then sold. In such cases the papal church steps in and induces some rich English or American Roman Catholic to buy it. It now becomes private property. The next step is to put back the monks or nuns into it as the servants of the owner, when the law cannot touch them. Dr. Robertson tells how he was shown by a very young monk over the monastery of St. Francis of Assisi. "How is it that you are a monk since your order was suppressed long before you were born?" asked the visitor. The young monk, with a laugh, said, "Come, I will show you the reason why I am a monk." He pointed to a door in the courtyard over which was a coat-of-arms. It was the escutcheon of Lord Ripon. The property had fallen in and Lord Ripon had bought it in and it had again become an extensive monastery. Now this transaction ought to be accounted a disgrace to an English nobleman. He well knew that the convents were suppressed, not in hostility to religion, but in the highest interests of religion; and yet in this manner he does his best to thwart the efforts of the government and people alike. I dwell on these matters because Dr. Robertson assures us that Americans are as guilty as Englishmen of this crime of plotting against Italy's welfare.

ST. GEORGE FOR MERRY ENGLAND.

Sunday, April 23, was St. George's Day. Many ministers took advantage of the occasion in order to enforce on the public mind some impressive lessons. It is true that St. George is a somewhat mythical personality; but for all that his legendary history exercises a powerful historical and moral effect. It is a beautiful history. In brief outline I will repeat it. St. George is the patron saint of England. Doubtless England could manage to get along very fairly without any patron saint. But as we have one, and that one is Saint George, it is well to know what is said of him. Very early in the Christian era, about the year 303, a soldier lived in Asia Minor, in Cappadocia, whose name was George. He was a man of high rank, for he was a military tribune and was a good soldier; but he was a noble and faithful Christian, who sealed his faith in Christ by suffering as a martyr in the terrible persecution under Diocletian. The poets and legendists have interwoven with history the beautiful tradition that St. George fought a dragon and delivered a lovely princess. Thus the story of this patron saint becomes one of a hero who risked the sacrifice of himself for a woman, instead of sacrificing some woman to himself. It is counted by the whole English race that it is an Englishman's duty to sacrifice himself and not another. Americans as well as Englishmen are everywhere proud to practice the Christian chivalry which is embodied in the legend of St. George. To men of the whole Anglo-Saxon race every woman is a king's daughter, and the highest care of the true man of this race is to treat every women as he would treat the daughter of a king. This is true Christian chivalry, and never was it more alive than at this hour. But how did St. George become the patron saint of England? When King Richard I., surnamed "Coeur de Lion," went to Palestine for the third crusade, he specially and solemnly placed his army under the tutelary care of St. George for a very particular reason. In the second crusade, when the Christian army was hard pressed by the Saracens at the siege of Antioch, reinforcements quite unexpectedly arrived and everybody said that this was owing to the miraculous intervention of St. George. From the time when Richard thus adopted the tutelage of St. George England has been under the patronage of that saint. We have a very magnificent monument which proves this. King Edward III., after the battle of Crecy, again solemnly dedicated his land and his arms to St. George, and he did so in a most substantial way, for he built and founded that splendid Chapel of St. George's at Windsor, which is one of the architectural glories of our country, and he also instituted the Order of the Garter.

THE TRUCE OF GOD.

A great commotion is being aroused in England over the question of seven-day newspapers. Two of the greatest dailies have begun to issue Sunday editions, and it is felt all over the land by all the best classes of the community that this is a deadly attack on that dearly cherished palladium of our national, social and religious liberties, the quiet and sacred English Sunday. There is a storm of indignation. It is not a mere agitation by Sabbatarian bigots. Noblemen like Lord Rosebery, the bishops and clergy generally, the Dissenters, without exception the leading Socialists, the overwhelming body of the news vendors and the great majority of the shopkeepers of every trade are massing themselves for protests against the sordid mammonship of the two millionaire proprietors who have made this assault on the most prized of all our institutions. I believe this is the one matter in which Britain stands in front of all the earth. She has conserved the one day of rest in the week when all others have sacrificed it to the call of greed or frivolity. The French workers in the revolution days clamored for the abolition of the Sunday rest on the plea that they needed seven days' pay and were willing to work, for it. They got their seven days of work, but they soon found that they had so cheapened their labor that they could only gain six days' remuneration. And now in both France and Germany there is a continuous call, but a perfectly vain one, for the return to a reposeful Sunday. For the operative classes this is not to be recovered after they have once let it go. The upper classes can have it, simply because they can the more easily make slaves of the lower classes, if these are willing to work all the time without a day of rest in the week. And now we are going to fight, for many an exciting week in England, against the few capitalists who have undertaken to smash the nation's grandest barrier against the flood of all the evils that have so far been dammed up within limits. We have no races of cricket matches on Sunnay here. Not a theatre is allowed to open its doors on the first day of the week in all the land. London is like a vast city fast asleep from Saturday night till Monday morning. And here is the secret of the national strength. Part of the popular force can be kept in reserve. Then in the hour of danger or stress the call can be made with effect on the power accumulated. But a people jaded by incessant and eternal strain on its energy must collapse in some hour of emergency. We are going to fight a hot battle for the English Sunday. Otherwise, all the journals will be constrained by the pressure of competition of these two to submit to the tyranny of a devil's revolution.

Children in China.

I presume at this time you are preparing for Children's Day offering. I know the sacrifices you make from day to day, for this great occasion adds greatly to the enjoyment of your exercises and will add much happiness to your future life.

In this letter I want to try to tell you about some of the sin and suffering we see in this land, and of the great need of more light being shed abroad in heathen lands.

Before coming to China, we heard it said that when a son was born into the family there was great rejoicing, and when a daughter was born there was mourning. After living here and knowing their customs, one does not wonder that this is so. Soon after returning to Lucheo fu, last fall, two of our neighbors had sons born to them, and we were presented with red-colored eggs as an announcement of the fact. Every one seemed to be very happy, and were congratulating the happy parents, who were all smiles. A month or so later, a little daughter was born into the family of our native evangelist, Chang. While they seemed very happy themselves, I noticed they did not send out the colored eggs, as they had done at the birth of a son, and wondered why they did not do so. On making inquiry, I was told that they did not send out eggs when a daughter was born, as it was rather a time for mourning than rejoicing. A son is called a little "sien seng," which means a little teacher, while a daughter is called a little "puh ren," which means a little servant or slave, as they are usually sold for a wife before they are two, three or four years of age, and sometimes taken from their mother at this early period and put under their mother-in-law's charge to bring up as she pleases.

About two moths ago a little daughter came to another family, who were not Christians, but they were in very good circumstances. The father is a native physician and quite respected by the people, and a regular attendant at our Sunday services. They semed very friendly toward us, and the whole family, as we thought, were interested in the gospel; but when their little daughter came, they sent a woman to me to see if they could not give it to me, saying they did not want to keep it, as it was a girl. They also sent our native evangelist to speak to Mr. Titus about the matter, and said, if I did not want it, they would give it to their elder sister. Of course, we did not take it, as we had been very wisely advised not to adopt a Chinese child. Moreover, should I take any, I should want to take an orphan child. Their interest seemed to abate for awhile after this, but they are beginning to be friendly again, and I hope as they hear more of the gospel, they will repent of their cruel deed.

It is very seldom that they keep more than two or three daughters in the home. The mother can do with them as she likes, drowning them immediately after birth, give them away or sell them for servants. I have had as many as a dozen offered to me within the past six months. My heart is troubled at times to know what to do. I long to take them, and let them know what a mother's love is, but at present our better judgment tells us not to do it.

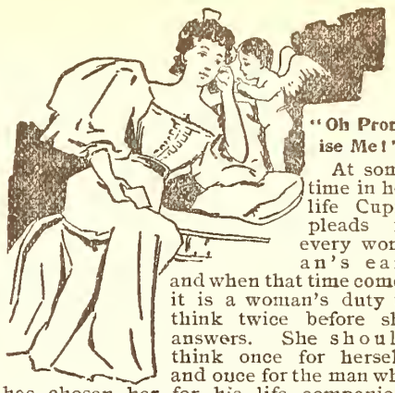
An old man came to our door one day during the Chinese New Year season and wanted to sell me his son, a boy of eight years. The old man was crazy for opium, and I suppose this was his last resort for getting money with which to buy it.

Now this all seems very cruel to you, but I wonder sometimes if it would not be better for the little innocent darlings if more of them were conveyed to an early and watery grave, and thus escape the suffering and sinful life that many of them are compelled to live after they are responsible for their actions.

A short time ago a beautiful young girl-wife, about eighteen, was brought to the hospital. She had eaten opium to escape living a sinful life. Her mother-in-law, a woman of bad repute, and an opium smoker, wanted her daughter-in-law tc lead an equally sinful life, and in this way supply her with money to get opium. Because the daughter-in-law rebelled, they had gotten into a quarrel, and she took the deadly drug rather than yield to her mother-in-law's wicked behests. But Dr. Welpton succeeded in restoring the would-be suicide, and the next morning I went out to see her and to talk to her about her soul. It was pitiful to hear her moan, and when I spoke to her, pressing my hand to her burning brow, she looked wonderingly at me for a moment, and then moaned again. She tried to tell me something, which I could not understand at the time. I talked to her of Jesus, who was able to take away the sin of the flesh, and she said she did not know him. I told her that if she would come to see me, when she got well, I would tell her about him, and sure enough, the next Lord's day she came, bringing both her mother and her mother-in-law. The latter said to me that she wanted to have her daughter-in-law's heart cleansed, thinking the sin was on the child for not respecting her senior's wishes; but when I told her that she was the one who needed her heart cleansed, she looked amazed at me. I told her that her own heart was sinful, and this was why the young wife wished to commit suicide. I said: "If you would love your little daughter-in-law, who was merely a child, and treat her kindly, I am sure she would not want to mistreat you." I preached to her earnestly for awhile, and of course, she has never returned to hear any more of the gospel. But oh, how often I wonder what will beome of the little daughter-in-law!

This is only one out of many such cases brought to the hospital. One daughter-in-law was starved for sometime and then strangled to death, because she did not please the husband and mother-in-law, and so far as we know, has received no punishment for her evil deed. She possibly has paid out money to have the matter settled, as such cases are usually settled with money in China.

Three of our Christian women have daughters already engaged to heathen husbands. Mrs. Hsu has one daughter, now eighteen, whom I fear any day her opium-smoking husband may want to take away. He is much older than herself, and very poor because he uses his money to buy opium. They say they will not allow her to go with him, but according to their customs I do not see how they can prevent it. She has two little girls who are not yet engaged, and she promises us that she will not engage them to heathen men. I was under the impression that this woman had only the six children, but have learned through one of the daughters that she had two younger sisters whom I had never seen, who had been taken to their mother-in-law's home while very young. I asked the mother one day how many children she had, and she counted them on her fingers, saying, "Six: three girls and three boys;" not even mentioning the two little girls who had been sold for wives when so young. It is hard to get them to realize how wrong this is.



One morning, as a young daughter-in-law was being caried away from the hospital after being restored from opium, we asked our native pastor if there was any way that they could break the engagement of their daughter, as she is engaged to a boy whose parents both use opium and worship idols. I said tearfully, How do you know but in a few years she will have to suffer as this little daughter-in-law does now? He shook his head and said: "The matter was settled and could not be changed according to their customs. According to the teaching of Confucius, it is considered a crime down to the seventh generation. We argued with him that, as a pastor, he certainly would have to preach against such customs, and how could he do it, if he did not set the example? He really wept, and said he could do that by not engaging their little baby-girl. He said he had repented and would gladly recall the other one if he could, but she really was not his child, according to their law. So there is no way of escape for those who are already engaged. But oh, how we do pray that the Heavenly Father will in his own way bless those who are under bondage to heaten customs!

We know you are praying earnestly for these people, that the light of the gospel may shine upon them. We believe it sufficient, and will in time overcome Satan and all his teachings. May the Lord abundatly bless and porsper you in your work for him, and may your lives be crowned with happiness and joy in his service.

With Christian love I am yours sincerely,

"Oh Promise Me!"

At some time in her life Cupid pleads in every woman's ear, and when that time comes it is a woman's duty to think twice before she answers. She should think once for herself, and once for the man who has chosen her for his life companion.

If she is suffering from a torturing, dragging weakness or disease so prevalent with her sex, she has no right to answer "Yes" until her health is restored. If she does, she will be wretched and ill herself and her home will be an unhappy one. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a scientific remedy that cures all weakness, disease, disorder and derangement of the delicate and important feminine organs. It is not a "cure-all," but a medicine devised to correct this one class of disorders and no other. It has accomplished its purpose in tens of thousands of cases, as is shown by tens of thousands of testimonials of the grateful patients themselves. It imparts vigor and virility to the entire womanly organism, and is the best of all nerve tonics and restoratives. It fits for wifehood and motherhood. It transforms weak, nervous, despondent invalids into healthy, happy women.

"I was so weak I could scarcely walk about the house," writes Mrs. Mattie Scruggs, of Allen's Creek, Amherst Co., Va. "Was reduced to a mere skeleton. I was never free from pain in the back and head and could not sleep at night. I bought three bottles of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and 'Golden Medical Discovery' and two vials of 'Pleasant Pellets.' After taking these six weeks I felt like a new person; slept well and gained in flesh. I am doing all my own housework and we have nine in the family."

A man or woman who neglects constipation suffers from slow poisoning. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets cure constipation. One little "Pellet" is a gentle laxative, and two a mild cathartic. All medicine dealers sell them. No other pills are "just as good."

New York Letter.

The conference of the Disciples of Christ in the Middle or North Atlantic States, held at the First Christian Church, Philadelphia, May 9-11, was an unqualified success. The attendance of delegates from outside the city was something like one hundred, and the spirit of the conference was delightfully hopeful and fraternal. Representatives were there from the states of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia. Some twenty years ago a similar conference was held representing some of these states, though the attendance was not so large. After two or three years that association ceased to exist and no effort at co-operation on so large a scale was attempted until the present meeting at Philadelphia. The objects of the conference were educational, inspirational and evangelistic. Those promoting the movement hoped that a permanent organization would be effected to carry on the work of evangelism more extensively, planting new missions if possible in many of the great cities of the Atlantic Seaboard; and that arrangements might be made for an annual conference of the churches in these states. These objects were attained.

The conference decided to ask the American Christian Missionary Society to sustain a general superintending evangelist in this field, promising to render all possible assistance in selecting, supporting and directing the labors of such an evangelist. An executive committee was appointed consisting of one member from each political division included in the call. The personnel of the committee is S. T. Willis, New York; B. W. Hand, New Jersey; Dr. E. E. Montgomery, Pennsylvania; J. A. Hopkins, Delaware; Peter Ainslie, Maryland; F. D. Power, District of Columbia, and H. C. Garrison, Virginia, and at a meeting of the committee held at Philadelphia on the 11th Dr. E. E. Montgomery was elected chairman and S T. Willis was elected secretary and treasurer. So now the forces are organized, the plans are mapped out, and negotiations have been opened with the American Christian Missionary Society with every hope of success. It was not the wish of a single person to make this work independent of our general home missionary organization, but rather it is our hope to make it auxiliary to it. We wish to unify our efforts at American evangelization and will do all within our power toward this end.

Bro. F. D. Power was elected chairman of the conference, S. T. Willis vice-chairman and B. Q. Denham recording secretary. Bro. Power presided over the sessions with his usual grace, dignity and fraternal impartiality until Thursday noon, when he was compelled to leave, and the vice-chairman took his place. F. D. Power's address on "The Pioneer Disciples of the East" struck a high keynote and aroused an enthusiasm which was sustained throughout the whole conference. It was a charming discourse. The address of Bro. J. S. Myers welcoming us to their city and church was genuinely whole-hearted and made us all feel at home with our Philadelphia brethren. Bro. J. W. Mulholland's entertainment committee assigned us to pleasant homes and the women of the Philadelphia church served bountiful luncheons in the lecture room. The hospitality of our brethren in "the city of brotherly love" was generous, hearty beautiful. Bro. G. P. Rutledge, of the Third Church, and his people are included in this statement. A number of us (old-time friends) had the pleasure of taking tea, by special invitation, at his hospitable home, where the friendships of of other days were renewed. One of the delightfully inspiring features of the conference was the soulful singing of Miss Florence Robertson, of Scranton, Pa., who came on purdose to "lend a hand" in this way. The importance of city missions was commended to our intellects and laid upon our hearts by Bro. W. J. Wright, of Washington. The great field of Sunday-school missions was explored and reported to us in an admirable paper by Bro. B. A. Abbott, of Baltimore. Brethren Power, Hopkins, Abbott, Hertzog and others discussed the question of a ministerial training school or institute for the East, and a standing committee was appointed to take up the matter and report a year hence. The presence of a number of the veterans, such as Bro. M. C. Tiers, James Carr, Samuel Troth and others, gave a kind of fatherly benediction to the conference which all appreciated. Bro. J. M. Philputt, of New York, made a statement concerning his purpose to discontinue certain irregularities in his congregation which made all our hearts leap for joy.

The claims of the institutional or open church were vividly put before us in a paper by Bro. W. C. Payne, of New York, and discussed by others. Bro. Peter Ainslie, the experienced editor of the Christian Tribune, told us of the expensive luxuries of editorship, but his address brought out many appreciative words regarding our excellenq religious papers and their great value to their cause. Bro. Herr Gustavus Cohen, a Christian Jew, brought us many interesting thoughts in his illustrated address, "Christianity for the Jews." Bro. H. O. Breeden, our Mercurius, came from Des Moines to tell us in the finished style of the rhetorician of "The Gospel for the Cities of To-day," and "The Minister for this Age," both of which were highly appreciated. Bro. H. C. Garrison, of Richmond, took the place of Sec. C. C. Smith, and drew a striking parallelism between the fundamental principles and genius of the American Republic, politically, and the Disciples of Christ, religiously. Brethren E. B. Bagby, J. S. Myers, J. A. Hopkins and P. A. Cave suggested a number of valuable points on "How to Evangelize the East." The interests of the Y. P. S. C. E. and the Sunday-school were not neglected. A conference of practical value was held on each line of work.

May general interests were especially considered. W. J. Wright led a concert of prayer for our foreign missionaries, B. Q. Denham urged upon us the claims of Church Extension, D. G. Hertzog reminded us of Hiram, J. A. Hopkins put in a telling plea for old Bethany, "the mother of us all," and a number of us boomed the coming Jubilee at Cincinnati.

The closing session took us up to the mountain top of delightful fellowship in spiritual things, and gave us a foretaste of the New Jerusalem joys. We closed by singing, "God be with you till we meet again." The next conference will be held at Hagerstown in May of 1900.

Contentment is to be striven after and attained. It lies in every one's power, and a cheerful content is every one's privilage and duty. Happiness is a very different matter. It is not in our power, and to strive after it often results in the most absolute selfishness. Blessedness is highest of all, and is the gift of God to those souls that seek Him unselfishly and wholly. Shall we not be satisfied with content, or shall we strive after happiness, when we may have blessedness for our portion?

Pittsburg Letter.

With the great iron mills, locomotive shops, steel car factories and all business moving at a highly accelerated rate of speed, the city of Pittsburg is a vast hive of industry these bright spring days and weeks. Never in all her history has the city experienced such a season of prosperity. Large numbers of moderately priced houses are being built, and the people are investing in lots in the suburbs upon which to build their homes by and by. Nearly every congregation among the Disciples has representatives who are home building at this season. This means much to our cause here. The property owners have a more abiding interest in city evangelization than the renters. Good citizenship means reduced taxation, less crime, fewer officials to be supported. Disciples are not slow to see the close relationship that exists between city evangelization and good citizenship. A good Christian invariably makes a good citizen. If the preacher could only exemplify his doctrine in home building, it might not be inadvisable for him to preach relative to the value of each member of his congregation seeking to be a home owner.

There has been no great meeting held in Pittsburg for some months. But each pastor has been able to report constant accessions to the church. W. H. Bok, of Virginia, assisted F. F. Bullard, of Greensburg, in a meeting with thirty added. J. H. Noonan, of Detroit, assisted T. E. Cramblet, of the East End, with a result of twenty-five. T. E. Cramblet assisted Dr. Thayer at Newcastle with additions of thirty. The Observatory Hill Church with home forces brought its meeting to a close with thirty-three added. Bro. O. H. Phillips adopted a novel plan for his work. Asked brethren from the various churches in the vicinity to each preach one evening. Meeting carried on for three weeks, resulting in twenty-five additions. All the churches have had continuous accessions, so that the work is in a healthful, growing condition.

Bro. Earle Wiffley, of Wabash, Indiana, has been selected by the American Christian Missionary Society for the arduous work of city evangelist. He begins his work almost immediately at Turtle Creek under the direct sustenance of the Braddock Church. We are confident that having begun this work it will be carried on to success.

Bro. C. L. Thurgood and wife recently had a call from a prosperous church in Melbourne, Australia, to take of its work, but we are rejoiced to know that old Central had so twined itself around their hearts that they could not leave it. True workers for the Master are these two consecrated spirits.

Under the hustling management of Bro. Jos. Craig Belleview has bought a valuable lot, and just a few days ago ground was broken for a church that will be a marvel of beauty for its small cost of ten thousand dollars.

Headed by Robt S. Latimer, our faithful president of the W. P. C. M. S., there has been organized what might be termed a lay preachers' organization, composed of twelve brethren or more who go from point to point in and around these two great cities, in a systematic way preaching the gospel on successive Lord's day evenings. Good results are following the work as is ever the case when the gospel is preached.

The reports of the preachers show that Home Missionary Day was generally observed, the results even in the smaller churches being beyond most sanguine expectations.

The semi-annual convention of the Disciples was held at New Castle, May 9th to 12th. A great host of loyal ones from all parts went up to the "Convention City." Bro. Latimer, who has filled efficiently the president's chair of the W. P. C. M. S. for eleven years said, "It's the best yet; every year it gets better and better." The best speech of the convention was made by Miss May Netting, of the First Church, Allegheny, upon the theme, "What will the Endeavorers do for Western Pennsylvania?" If the Endeavorers of the First Church, as well as all our Endeavor Societies, will follow her notable suggestions no difficulty will be had in carrying forward our work. The trouble has been in the past lack of practical co-operation with the Western Pennsylvania Board on the part of some of the larger societies, which has resulted in a division of the forces. But this, thank God, is being overcome. All the societies are wheeling into line and with the organization of sub-county Endeavor unions throughout the district, each sub-union pledged to help the W. P. C. M. S., the truth will be exemplified "In union there is strength," and many souls will be won for Jesus Christ. The happy-hearted and genial-faced J. Z. Tyler, "Father of Christian Endeavor" among Disciples, was also present at the convention and presented one of his old-time ringing speeches, urging progress along the lines of loyalty to the Book, evangelism and missionary effort for the Endeavorers. If Bro. Tyler's appearance and speech are the expressions of his vitality, he is good for fifty years more of work. My, my, what a grand national superintendent he would make for our young people if he could only give all his time to the work!

PRICKLING POINTS FROM THE CONVENTION.

M. H. Wilson, pastor of the Knoxville Church, announced that his church had become self-supporting, raised his salary and pledged through the Endeavor Society fifty dollars for Western Pennsylvania Missions.

T. E. Cramblet made a wonderful speech for Western Pennsylvania, and closed with a burst of pleading eloquence that brought subscriptions to the amount of seven hundred dollars for the work nearest his heart.

Some of the brethren carried "a little white dog" with them that attracted considerable attention.

Nearly all of the preaching brethren of the district were present. One straggled in at the last moment and went away on the first train. The best way to get the most out of these meetings is to go early and stay late. A convention is like a fellow's sweetheart, the longer he stays with it the better it grows. "Conventions are like kisses," so Craig says, "they should be repeated frequently." Next convention, next September, at East End Church, Pittsburg, under the auspices of Central. Plan for it, and let every one be at the opening session and stay to the close. In the meantime pray, work and give for Western Pennsylvania work. JOHN A. JAYNE.

THE HELPING HAND, by W. W. Dowling, is a manual of instruction for the Y. P. S. C. E., that great movement of the century that is putting new life into our churches, by interesting the young, causing them to flock to the Lord's house "as doves to the windows," and encouraging them earnestly in the Lord's work. It contains, in the most condensed form, full information concerning the Y. P. S. . E. movement, with instructions and suggestions concerning every point. This work has had a more extensive circulation, and proved more helpful to Endeavor workers than any other hand-book published. 25 cents. Christian Pub. Co St. Louis.

Illinois Sunday-school Association.

The forty-first annual convention of the Illinois Sunday-school Association was held in Decatur, May 16-18th, 1899. The convention is not a mass meeting, but a delegate body. More than 600 delegates attended, nearly every county in the state represented. Very few of them were preachers. They all attended the convention faithfully. As many as 300 gathered in the morning prayer meeting at six o'clock. Most of them had their Bibles and used their note books freely. Bilhorn and his folding organ led magnificent singing. A part of the time soloists, quartets and the great pipe organ assisted.

There were banquets for the alumni of the normal course and for the primary workers. Many enjoyed a trolley ride and with it the city was treated to their singing as they rode. A fine hospitality was given the visitors. The speeches and addresses with a very few exceptions were very commonplace. F. G. Tyrrell's address on "Our Text-book" was one of the very few exceptions. One other bright address was by Mrs. Mary Foster Bryner, of Chicago. A third delightful address was that of Rev. Johnston Myers, of Chicago. Prof. H. M. Hamill gave a study of John's Gospel that I wish all of our teachers and preachers might have heard. With all our boast of being a Bible people, why is it that we expect other teachers to give us these simple and sensible methods of "thinking through" single books of the Bible? It is humiliating to me to be compelled to own our neglect in this feature, so helpful to popular Bible study.

B. F. Jacobs gave a helpful study of next Sunday's lesson. He lectured. It would be difficult to succeed in the ordinary class with his method.

The Association comprises 20 districts, 102 counties, and 1,570 townships, each having its individual organization. During the year 100 county and 1,333 township conventions were held. The total enrollment in the 7,962 schools is 791,785 pupils, teachers and officers, a decrease of 429 from last year. 19,865 additions to the churches are reported. The amount of benevolent contributions for the year is $65,-816.98. The membership in the home department is 14,563.

The treasurer reports disbursements to the amount of $9,434.88. $7,056.92 of this amount was paid to "salaries and expenses—secretaries and field workers," $318.75 was expended on the primary workers' summer school. The call is for $10,500 next year.

The best session of the convention was that given to the primary workers. In this connection considerable prominence was given to the summer school for primary workers to be held in Chicago, Aug. 15 to 25. The tuition is free, board reasonable and railroad fare reduced. It would be a great thing for our schools to send their primary teachers.

Here are a few things that I thought concerning ourselves and this convention: I thought it a strange thing that of all our preachers and Sunday-school workers living less than fifty miles from Decatur less than a score, all told, were at the convention. Five of our preachers were here a part of the time. Do we know it all? Have we nothing to impart? My experience is that we can have proper part of program and hearing if we are willing to accept the work it demands. I think we are blundering. There is much we can learn and much we can teach.

None of our state Sunday-school workers were present, nor any member of our state association. Are we too modest, or too careless, or too sectarian, or is it that we are just dead?

I was glad to feel the power of the spirit of Christian love and unity. It was a rare thing that the existence of denominational lines was mentioned. Of how little consequence they apparently are! Our preachers are at home in such a meeting, and it is a matter of regret that numbers of them were not there to surcharge the atmosphere with more of that feeling.

Great emphasis was placed upon the training of the children. I think I have wasted too much of my time on the old folks. For a year or more I have been studying the problem of reaching the young ones. This determination was strengthened at this convention.

Great emphasis was placed upon the use of the Bible in the school. A resolution was adopted urging that all lesson helps be left at home. We should be the first people to say "amen."

I heard many ignorant words about the Holy Spirit. These people are ignorant of this great subject, but they are studying it the best they can. I am therefore glad. Our people are just as ignorant, but they are not studying this teaching. For this I am sorry. These are three great things for us to know: The person and power of the Holy Spirit, that we may know the Word he has spoken, that we and our children may become like little children so that we may inherit the kingdom of heaven.

THE DISCIPLES' PLEA.

In the year 1809 the now famous Declaration and Address was promulgated by Thos. Campbell and others. This was simply an arraignment of sectism and a plea for the union of the people of God. The central idea in this address constitutes the very essence of the plea of the Disciples. As a religious people they stand as a protest against division and they plead earnestly for union. Around this great central thought the other items of their plea are grouped. The method by which they seek to bring about the desired union is no less unique than the plea itself. They do not believe that union can ever be brought about by compromise, but they hold that the only practical way to unite divided Protestantism is by a return to the Christianity of the primitive age. "Back to Jerusalem" is their cry. In short, they plead for union on the basis of simple apostolic Christianity.

POINTS OF EMPHASIS.

As a natural result of their method the Disciples have always given large prominence to the great commission of Christ. They have preached upon it perhaps more than any other religious people. They have regarded this as the starting-point, and consequently they have been an evangelistic people. Two distinct epochs, however, in the history of this people are discoverable. During the first epoch the last half of the commission received the emphasis: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." The reason for this is not hard to discover. In the mysticism of the period, and in the midst of the jangling voices of a divided church, the plain and explicit terms of pardon have been lost sight of. Inquiring sinners were left to grope in darkness without any clear answer to the question, What must I do to be saved? It was most natural that a great evangelistic body taking their stand upon the commission of Christ should give the plain, simple answer to this question that was given by the apostles of Christ. However, in the process of time, after numbers had increased, certain leading brethren called attention to the fact that we had not yet reached the beginning-place. They contended that the first half of the commission should now receive emphasis: "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Following this came our missionary development until we are now making a creditable record as a missionary people. It certainly must be apparent to every close observer that we are now about to enter upon the third great epoch, namely, the work of preparation for carrying out the great commission; in short, the time has come for the planting of our colleges on a solid financial basis that we may be able to meet the continually growing demands for an adequate, well-equipped ministry. Before Jesus Christ gave his great commission he trained his men. He never gave a commission to an unprepared man. He spent three years and a half in training men before he ventured to say to them, "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Colleges are the only reliable source of supply for a well-equipped ministry. There may be exceptional cases of men who become effective in the ministry without the agency of the colleges; but for an adequate, reliable supply of men for work in the local churches in our home field and in the foreign fields, colleges are an absolute necessity. In this day of advancing standards in education only thoroughly equipped men can do effective work. Other religious bodies are putting millions of dollars into college endowment. Within the last four months about five millions of dollars have been put into college endowment. The Disciples as a people have not yet put one million dollars into college endowment in all their history. That is to say, the endowments of all our schools combined would not reach a million. As a consequence of this the continually growing number of young people are drifting away from our own schools and are being educated in the schools of other religious bodies. If we do not wake up to the danger that confronts us, within a few years the larger part and the best part of our young people will drift away from us entirely. We must offer in our colleges as good advantages as other religious bodies offer, or we cannot hold our young people, and whenever we lose our young people the hope of the future is gone. College endowment is the overshadowing issue of the present time. We ought now to enter upon a new epoch—the third epoch of our history. Within the next five years at least five million dollars should be given to our colleges. Will we do it? This would mean more for Home Missions and Foreign Missions, and every form of general work, than anything else we could possibly do. After the Baptists had been doing work for years on the foreign field they were compelled to direct their attention to colleges as the basis of supply for workers on the foreign field, and within a few years they put seventeen million dollars into colleges. The needs of our work at home and abroad suggest to us the necessity for doing the same thing. If we love Home Missions in any of its departments, if we love Foreign Missions, if we love the work of God, let us now turn our attention to the endowment of our colleges.

Hiram is making a tremendous effort for a quarter of a million dollars. She has appealed to the people. She has asked fifty thousand Disciples to join heart and hand in the accomplishment of this work. Will you not enlist at once? Send your name to Jubilee Notes.

Bro. E. L. Powell's address at our Jubilee Rally, May 2nd, on "Some Striking Things in Fifty Years of Our History" was highly appreciated.

Our local C. E. committee has arranged with the C. W. B. M. for a great C. E. meeting, Saturday night of convention week. Bro. John E. Pounds, the new C. E. superintendent, will likely make an address. This committee also recommends to our C. E. Societies that the subject for June 11th be "Our Jubilee Convention." The Lookout for May 20th contains a fine program for the meeting.

A letter from J. W. Ingram from Pasadena, California, tells us to expect two carloads from there. A circular signed by himself and Bro. Shadle has been sent out to those who would likely go, telling of the advantages of the trip and urging an early decision.

Bro. W. B. Taylor writes from Chicago, saying: "The indications are that Chicago will have ten times as many people at the Jubilee Convention as at any other national convention outside of our own city."

Our enlarged home offering means much for the joy of the convention. Certainly, all are happy to see the churches of the Jubilee City double up, and it is but fitting that this year the "Historic Old Central" should be in the lead.

Several of the colleges usually have a banquet sometime during the convention. I suggest that all who desire anything of the kind this year arrange for it at once and that it be announced before the colleges adjourn for vacation, that the studends and alumni may work it up through the summer and colleges near by can arrange for excursions to attend the convention that day at least.

Brethren Justin N. Green and John S. Lawrence now have charge of our assignment work. Bro Green reported yesterday, after a preliminary canvass, that the rate in private nomes and many boarding houses would be $1 per day. A number of good rooms can be had from 25 cents up to 75 cents a night. A few people have already secured quarters in homes.

The Ohio state program has Bro. A. W. Taylor booked to speak on "Cincinnati '99," and for the "Jubilee Year" C. L. Loos, A. McLean, B. L. Smith, Miss Bettie Wilson and G. W. Muckley. What convention can beat this?

Dr. T. F. Draskill writes for Corsicana, Texas, saying: "Early in the year I determined to work up an excursion from Texas and Arkansas. Quite a number are now enrolled." He estimates the delegation from 75 to 125.

Bro. Muckley, of Kansas City writes: "We are working up delegations at this point to have the California, Colorado, Kansas and Nebraska delegations join us at Kansas City. Already three car loads are promised from California. We will all go together from here to Cincinnati."

Save your money and take your vacation in Cincinnati in October. A great Children's Day on June 4th will be another cause for rejoicing in Cincinnati. A. M. HARVUOT.

Educational Conference for Illinois.

The Educational Conference of the Churches Christ of Illinois met in Springfield, May 15th. Pastor J. E. Lynn called the meeting to order at ten o'clock and led the devotions. Judge Chas. P. Kane was chosen chairman and Marion Stevenson secretary.

The secretary and G. L. Peters and J. E. Lynn were appointed a press committee. Pres. Hardin then gave an address, "The Statement of the Case," for the college at Eureka. He gave the amount of the productive endowment, the amount of various bequests not yet realized, a statement of the income and expenditures, value of buildings and equipments, number of students etc., in answer to questions.

The enrollment committee, G. L. Snively and L. H. Coleman, reported an attendance of one hundred, seventy-six of whom were from without Springfield. The afternoon meeting was opened by a devotional meeting under the direction of J. H. Gilliland. W. B. Taylor led in the discussion of the topic, "A Church College for Present-day Demands." The following took part in the discussion: Marion Stevenson, Prof. Putman, of Illinois College, J. W. Knight, G. L. Peters, W. H. McGinnis, J. G. Waggoner, J. E. Lynn, J. H. Hardin, J. H. Stark, R. E. Dunlap, C. P. Kane and possibly some others. Mrs. N. B. Crawford spoke of the work of the College Aid Assocation. An informal discussion of the question of permanent organization resulted in the adoption of a resolution favoring the idea, and in the appointment of a committee to nominate officers of such an organization.

At the opening of the night session the committee on resolutions presented the following report which was adopted:

Your commitee on resolutions begs leave to report as follows:

RESOLVED, That there be a permanent organization effected in the interests of Christian education.

That the organization be called "The Christian Educational Conference of Illinois."

That a committee of eleven members be appointed, one member from each missionary district as far as possible, and a president and a secretary.

That the committee plan for the observance of Educational Day the first Lord's day in July without asking for an offering.

That President Hardin furnish this committee with full information for use in carrying forward a campaign of education.

That the committee prepare a constitution and bylaws and submit the same to the next assembly.

That it is the judgment of this body that new endowment to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars be made to Eureka College within a year, and that the brotherhood send large numbers of new students to the institution. Signed by the committee, J. Fred Jones, J. B. Camp, N. B. Crawford, J. E. Lynn, W. B. Taylor.

The committee on nominations reported as follows: For president, J. H. Hardin, for secretary, R. E. Hieronymous. We recommend that the president and the secretary be allowed to select the other eleven members of the board. Signed, J. H. Gilliland, James W. Jefferson.

The remainder of the evening hour was occupied by an address by Prof. Radford on "Christian Education the Basis of Christian Citizenship." This address was followed by one from J. H. Garrison on "Eureka College a Hundred Years from Now."

The social features of the conference was delightful. The ladies of the church spread a substantial luncheon at twelve and served a choice banquet at five o'clock. The visitors did especial justice to the latter. When the chairs were pushed back J. G. Waggoner in the role of toast master called for attention. Here are the toasts and responses: The College and the University, W. B. Taylor. The Heroic in Eureka College, Marion Stevenson. The Eureka College Student, W. E. Spicer. Eureka College and our Women, Mrs. N. B. Crawford. Christian Education and the Physician, Dr. F. D. Pratz. Christian Education and Women, Mrs. J. E. Lynn. Christian Education and the Law, Hon. C. P. Kane. Present Friends for Eureka College, M. D. Camp. Roots of Eureka College, J. H. Pickerill. Crumbs Swept Up, B. J. Radford. The singing of the male quartet of the Springfield choir was highly appreciated. Pastor Lynn and his wife were elegant hosts. May 15th, 1899 was indeed a red-letter day for Eureka College. Pres. Hardin was radiant.

MARION STEVENSON, Secretary.

In Memory of F. M. Bruner.

I was much pained to read in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of May 11th of the death of our dear Bro. F. M. Bruner. I knew Bro. Bruner well. I saw him and was near to him in times of trial. When the interests of dear old Abingdon College were upon him I often thought that if the brotherhood of Illinois could have witnessed his struggles to maintain that institution he would have received more generous aid.

Never have I known a more humble, a more devout, God-loving, God-fearing man. It always seemed to me the greater his burden the more humble and submissive his heart. He was a firm friend to the young preacher and his words of encouragement a benediction. And even in his last sufferings, which were very great, he maintained his old-time sweetness of spirit. His personal letter to me when he was not able to sit up while he wrote was full of cheer, characterized by his old-time words of kindness and of resignation. He devoutly believed himself to be in the hands of God, whom he loved. If it is possible, Bro. Bruner was generous to a fault. A feature of his life is worthy of notice, and it very clearly explains much of it. His great confidence in men—often deceived by them—too many times accepting the appearances for the reality. He was so trustful that he could not mistrust his fellowman. This sometimes proved hurtful to his interests, yet he would not complain nor become doubtful of others. In his class work as teacher of young men for the ministry he was patient, painstaking, thorough. Never too weary to put great energy into his work. Touching analysis and exegesis he was master. It has been 15 years next month since I completed the Bible course under him. Since then I have tried to be a faithful student of the Word, yet in all these years I have seen no reason for changing any of his positions.

The brotherhood has lost a great man in him, yet not lost. His influence still lives. All his writings deserve to be appreciated. The writer knew Bro. Bruner well and loved him as he loved but few other men. Bro. Bruner was large in all of his plans and purposes. He saw the needs of the church and with great zeal and wisdom tried to supply them. His efforts, I am persuaded, will not be lost. I trust our colleges will raise up strong young men to take up the work laid down by these worthy workmen. A cordial sympathy is doubtless extended to the bereft family by a grateful brotherhood. T. F. WEAVER.

Texarkana, Tex., May 18, 1899.

Minnesota Letter.

DEAR BRETHREN:—"Yet three weeks until the harvest." Are you preparing for the harvesting day? There is no work in the brotherhood more important than taking America for Christ. Christ taught first to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; so should we. Can we say with Paul that our heart's desire and prayer is that our own country should be saved? O, brethren in this gospel needy state, do you not feel the need of Home Missions?

What could we do in our weakness did not the home board assist? If you have arranged for the May offering you will endure these words. If you have not you do not feel the Spirit striving within you saying, "When thou canst not go, send." America, the common dwelling-place of all races, will bring the world to Christ with less expense than can be done in any other possible way. Help save America; yes, help save Minnesota.

The resignation of Bro. McCurdy, as state evangelist, was accepted at our last board meeting. He will devote himself to life insurance for a time, preaching on Sundays. He has done us good work. At the same meeting Bro. C. C. Atwood and F. Howard Sweetman were elected to state work as evangelist and singer. They are now in a meeting at Worthington. It is virgin soil, but the prospects are good.

The meeting at Rat Portage, Canada, under the direction of the Minnesota and A. C. M. S. boards, is doing well. Bro. Givens, of Lincoln, Neb., passed through St. Paul to-day on his way there to conduct the singing.

Churches, remit your apportionments. Our work must not lag. We have brought in over three hundred souls so far this year. Let the harvest continue.

Preachers, church correspondents, send me items of news touching your work, that I may incorporate them in the Minnesota Letter to the edification of the Minnesota Disciples.

Kansas Items.

The board of directors, of which Elder A. B. Engle, of Medicine Lodge, is chairman, are working diligently to have the Kansas Christian College at Harper, Kansas, open its doors in September, 1899.

S. S. McGill and J. F. Haile, of Kingman, are two of the directors.

The people of Harper will give our people the free use of buildings as long as they maintain a college. The buildings are worth $15,000 and were originally a courthouse, etc.

Harper is a good location for a college, being a railroad center, in a good country, is near the line between Kansas and Oklahoma, and there are no institutions of higher instruction nearer than fifty miles. A president has not been chosen yet, and the board is hunting a good man. The prospects for this college are bright, and it is almost sure to be a success from the first.

S. S. McGill delivered the "Baccalaureate Sermon" for the 1898-1899 high school class. Exercises were held in the Presbyterian Church. He is well educated, being a Bethany graduate.

We have a jewel of a minister in Bro. McGill and want to retain him indefinitely. We hereby serve notice that if any other church tries to secure his services we shall consider it as a trespasser. IDO.

A Great American Industry.

The well-known New York Condensed Milk Co., of New York City, has just been reorganized and incorporated as Borden's Condensed Milk Company. The capitalization is $20,000,000. The incorporators are H. Lee Borden, Joseph Milbank, William J. Rogers, Albert J. Milbank and Isaac Milbank. The entire amount of stock was taken by the stockholders of the old company, except a portion which was set aside to be sold to some of the prominent and most valued employees of the company. Borden's Condensed Milk Company is at the present time the largest manufacturers of proprietary food products in the world.

The first output of Gail Borden's valuable invention dates back to 1857, and a year later an organization was formed which has been long and favorably known as the New York Condensed Milk Company.

Constant additions to the Company's manufacturing facilities have been made year by year to keep pace with the increasing demand. New factories have been added, until now it operates fifteen large plants, among which are some that outrank in size, capacity and actual product manufactured, any other factories of a similar nature in the world.

Washington Convention.

The West Side District Convention of Washington will be held at Seattle, May 30th, 31st and June 1st. A splendid program has been arranged and a profitable convention is expected. Though far removed from the great body of our brotherhood, our plans and purposes are the same—to take America and the world for Christ. F. B. SAPP, Cor. Sec.

Third Illinois District.

The convention of the third district of Illnois and the Ministerial Institute of the Military Tract, held at Canton, Ill., May 16-18, 1899, can be counted among the best ever held in our history. The addresses, discussions and sermons were instructive, sweet-spirited and exalted Christ in the hearts of the people.

Bro. J. P. Lichtenberger and the church at Canton entertained the convention in a royal manner.

We meet next year at Augusta.

Marion County, Illinois.

The ministers of this county met in the Christian Church, at Salem, Saturday, May 13, and organized the Marion County Ministerial Association with Eld. J. F. Rossborough, of Sandoval, president; Eld. L. D. Hill, of Rell, Treas., and G. Halleck Rowe, of Salem, Sec. This is for the purpose of bringing the ministers of the county into closer touch, that more and better work may be accomplished by their co-operation. The plan is that at favorable times we go out, two by two, into the Macedonias of the county and do all the home missionary work that we can in addition to our regular work. G. HALLECK ROWE.

Parkersburg (Ill.) Meeting.

Just returned from Parkersburg, Ill., where I was engaged in about a three weeks' meeting, beginning the 12th of April. My wife accompanied me and we had a very delightful time as well as a very profitable meeting. There were 13 conversions, among them a most excellent couple of young people, whom I had the pleasure of uniting as husband and wife, and then in a few nights afterwards of receiving their confession and burying in baptism—the wife having previously been a member of the M. E. Church. The other churches made a strong and united effort to frustrate the larger results of our meeting, but we think with little effect.

Four years ago, during the month of April, I held a four weeks' meeting at Parkersburg with 56 accessions, about 20 of which came from the M. E. and U. B. Churches. We believe the outlook for the Creighton Ave. Church in this city is better than it has been for several months, and we trust we shall not be disappointed in our expectations.

Z. A. HARRIS.

46 Huestis Ave., Ft. Wayne, Ind., May, 18, 1899.

The Church of Christ in this place has for more than twenty years mantained apostolic order—faith in a person, Christ, baptism in his name, and the Bible as a guide. Here also is an academy with a charter from the state legislature, with 122 acres of land; fertile, beautiful—on this a neat dormitory 40 x 60 feet, three stories high, also a good school building, We desire to add a normal and industrial department. We lack adequate means. I hope God will put it into the heart of some good man or woman to contribute so as to bring this school into higher efficiency. The teaching force will be in harmony with the church referred to. The location is high and beautiful—railway between Lexington andDanville, an immense population, colored and white, around it. Who will help?

Florida Notes.

After preaching twenty-nine sermons here in Starke we have succeeded in awakening this church from a long sleep, and have rescued what has been considered a lost cause. We found this town to be very indifferent and stubborn, but we have a few brethren and sisters who still kept the name of the Lord. Our congregation here had entirely ceased to meet and the cause had no representative except an unfinished house and a handful of despondent members and a small debt on the property. Now we have a revised membership of about twenty-five or thirty enlivened members, with a good Sunday-school and regular weekly meetings, enough funds in sight to secure preaching half the time and we will add the different departments of church work as time and circumstances will permit. I shall locate my headquarters here for a time, but will continue in the field evangelizing. I closed a meeting of ten days near Jacksonville a few days before I came here. There were ten additions. Starke is a growing Florida town and will be ripe for a meeting in a few months from now. J. P. LEWIS.

Railroad Rates to Plattsburg.

This is the now arranged rates as far as is known, and they will probably stand. The Port Arthur Route, Fort Scott and Memphis, Missouri Pacific, Wabash, Burlington, Rock Island, and Santa Fe, all give a rate of one fare for the round trip, tickets on sale Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, June 12-14, good to return including Friday, June 16.

The Chicago and Alton makes no rate at all. Buy to junction points on any of the above roads and thence to Plattsburg. The M. K. & T. makes a rate of one fare and one-third for round-trip tickets to junction points, thence you can buy into Plattsburg. For instance, suppose you live or want to take a train at Fayette; you will buy round-trip tickets to Moberly for one and one-third fare, then buy over the Wabash round-trip tickets to Plattsburg for one fare.

I have tried to secure a special train from Lexington Junction to Plattsburg Monday evening. They want me to guarantee 100 passengers; this I cannot do, so if you go by the way of Lexington Junction be sure you get there on the early morning trains, as the train leaves there at 8:55 A. M., reaching Plattsburg at 10:42.

I have asked Mr. Sebastian, of the Rock Island, to give us a special connecting with their own train from the North and the Burlington from the East, Monday evening. I have not heard as yet. Watch the papers.

Be sure and ask your station agent a few days beforehand if he has instructions; if not, show him this communication and ask him to get his instructions at once.

Yours in His name,

T. A. ABBOTT,
R. R. Sec.

A Good Convention.

About a dozen years ago a convention was held in Tuscola, Ill., to organize a district missionary society. Bro. Alpheus Little, of Edgar Station, Edgar county, was a delegate from the Maple Grove Church. He had been for years an inveterate user of tobacco, but during the convention his supply ran out and even to this day it has never been renewed. So he and his consecrated wife bless the day of our first district convention. Since that time the district has been enlarged from four counties to ten, and is composed of Vermillion, Champaign, Dewitt, Macon, Piatt, Douglass, Edgar, Coles, Moultrie and Shelby.

Our state yearbook shows a total of 135 churches. The membership is reported to be 16,369. Our convention this year will be at Shelby. Our president, E. A. Gilliland, of Clinton will announce a good program in due time. Now let us have a good attendance. Shelbyville is easily reached. The convention will do us all good. It will unify our work. This is a great field. There is room for many new churches, and churches are easily started here. A few need strengthening. Fellow-Disciple, come and represent your part of the field. It will do you good and help others.

E. E. HARTLEY.

Illinois Notes.

Our board organized a church at Havana following work done by G. M. Goode and C. B. Dabney.

A meeting was conducted at Fandon by F. M. Brannic and D. J. Elsea and an organization formed. Bro. Elsea is the minister there and a new house is going up. Bro. Brannic will hold a meeting at Colmer in August.

Harry Holmes removes from Ipava to Pontiac, taking charge of the congregation.

W. A. Meloan recently went to Rushville and has gathered 11 conversions and five otherwise. F. M. Brannic had 10 confessions at Tennessee and opened a mission.

The new pastor Coleman, Roseville, has added eight persons to the church and the Endeavor Society is taking new life.

At Vermont, G. W. Ross, minister, there were 11 conversions recently and the church now numbers 271 members. There is a large attendance of men on the services and many of them confess the Lord. The church raises all money by direct giving and there is no resort to suppers, etc., as a means of raising money. The basement of the chapel was lately fitted up for the Bible-school and the brethren contemplate other improvements. The pastor is closing the sixth year and will no doubt be retained.

Send all statistical blanks to your district secretary.

The convention of the third district was the first of the year and was well attended and the spirit was fine. D. E. Hughes and H. C. Littleton were elected president and secretary and K. C. Ventress vice-president.

Let all districts come to the front with large gatherings and let there be 3,000 people at our state meeting. Yes!

Commencement Week at Eureka College.

On Sunday, June 11th prox., J. E. Lynn, of Springfield, Ill., will deliver the baccalaureate sermon; and on the 15th F. G. Tyrrell, of Chicago, will address the graduating class and the public. The usual events will occur on intervening days. We hope to welcome, in attendance on these exercises, a large number of the patrons, former students and other friends of the institution.

The Revelation institutes.

It is important to say to all who have in mind to secure this valuable course of lectures that as each course requires a week in delivery, no t very many courses can be delivered in a single year and all who desire to secure them should apply many months in advance, and fix the time and prepare the people for their coming and reception. To do this they should send for instruction on how to prepare for the Institute of St. John; sent free to all earnest inquirers. Address J. S. HUGHES.

Christian Orphan School of Missouri.

At a called meeting of the Board of Directors of the Orphan Scool of the Christian Church of Missouri, the 5th inst., we were authorized to go ahead with the school for another year. wealthy men pledged themselves to stand by us in the effort to preserve and enlarge the institution.

With renewed hope and energy I shall therefore enter upon the work of soliciting pupils for the session of 1899-1900.

Our closing exercises for this session begins Monday night, 22nd inst., and close Thursday night, 25th inst

We shall be glad to have you visit us at that time. Very truly yours,

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Plattsburg, June 12-15, with one fare for the round trip over nearly every railroad in Missouri, and this means a good delegation of our best workers from all the state. Our Brother Abbott has done well for us and we thank him for it, and now what are you going to do for yourself? Come? Good.

The improved condition of the work, the improved look of the workers at Granite City, struck me very forcibly on my last visit with them as compared with five years ago. In three years, W. H. Harris and his aids have done great things for Christ and the church, and the attendance is such that the brethren are planning to enlarge their seating and working capacity, for the room is crowded at every service, while during our institute the people were turned away in numbers. Mrs. C. Early, one of the teachers in the public school, is superintendent and here success is phenominal, and the forces which she has gathered around her are a faithful band of Chrisitan men and women, and the mandolin club with their sweet and soul-inspiring music all tend to help our Brother Harris make the school the success it is, an honor to God, a blessing to the community and a regular recruiting station for the church. The last night of our institute, with the aisles full of chairs, there were five additions, such was the interest. All day Sunday the house was packed, not especially because I was there, not at all, but because the tide is our way in Grant City, while five years ago it was against us. The brethren gave us one of the best offerings I have received in the field this year. Miss Anna Murray, our county Bible-school superintendent, did much to make the institute the success it was, as she does in all her work for us and the Christ. Such help is worth more to us than money, while among them they seek the apportionment of every school in the county. Little Ortis Harris filled three of the award of merit cards while I was in town, and Ellis Harris, the preacher's son, is going to work for one of the Teacher's Bibles at Plattsburg. Faithful workers, happy people.

The many friends of Sister Geo. E. Shanklin will rejoice to learn that she is improving daily and that George is himself again in the Lord's work, as is meet because of the goodness of God. They are in the new parsonage and it is cosy as a bird-cage. The school has Brother Bruce Goranson for superintendent and the improvement is manifest, so that they will again be with us in our co-operation for Christ, paying one-half their apportionment while I was with them, and assuring me that the other would follow before June. At King City, in the home of my Brother J. T. Craig, I soon learned of the work in all those regions. T. J. Hasty is at the head of the school again and this means growth and fellowship, and I was again made happy by the co-operation of friends in Christ Jesus. Here, too, in a very little while and happily too, Jack Craig filled a card and is now working on others. By the kindness of brethren Craig and Hasty and their families, my visit was made doubly pleasant, thanks to all.

Orchid is the best country church and school in Northwest Missouri, doing always the very highest order of work, and they never fail in their work to remember us, as they will this year and in all years while the Gaines, Hockenberry and Harper families are in control. They love Christ and serve him.

Northeastern Nebraska.

We landed in Stanton County, Nebraska, March 1st. Since coming here we have been busy looking over the field in this county. We have no organization within fifty miles of us. After resting awhile we visited Norfolk in Madison County. I heard there had been an organization of Discipies there at one time and while we were so near thought we would look over the field and see if we could be of any assistance to the brethren. We spent a week among the people and preached for them on Lord's day, April 9, 1899, and found in and around the city about 65 brethren who have not bowed the knee to sectarianism and who were glad to meet a minister of the primitive gospel again. They are a band of noble people, but badly discouraged. They do not feel themselves able to build a house of worship and employ a minister. They realize it will be time and money thrown away to meet longer in a hall as they have tried so long and failed.

Brethren of Nebraska! Can we not assist these people and the cause in this important center? With this number to start with it seems to me that a strong church could be organized in Norfolk that would be a blessing to its 6,000 population and a great incentive to assist in establishing the cause of Christ in Northeastern Nebraska. Let us think on these things.

We next visited Waterloo in Douglass County under the advice of Bro. H. C. Cramblet of Southern Omaha. We spent a few days there and preached over Lord's day, April 23, which resulted in a unanimous call to serve the church for an indefinite period. We have continued from that date and the work seems to be opening very favorably. We will soon locate here and hope to accomplish much for the Master.

This is a great farming state and the people are always in a hurry. Let us catch the same spirit in the Master's vineyard and take for our motto, Hustle, and we can accomplish much for Christ and his church.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S PRAYER MEETING and Its Improvement.

BY CAL OGBURN.

This book is the offspring of experience and observation, setting forth how to make the Young People's Prayer-Meetings most interesting and profitable. It has been written, not for the young people of the past, but for those of the present and future—not for the experienced, but for the inexperienced; "and now, little book, may God bless your mission of usefulness to the young men and young women, to the boys and to the girls who have pledged themselves to be loyal to Christ and the Church."

Notes from the Foreign Field.

James Ware, of Shanghai, China, reports four conversions.

The work in Japan is prospering. Frequent baptisms are reported. Every one seems hopeful.

T. J. Arnold baptized five believers at Yu Ho Tsz. This church is served by Evangelist Shi.

John Johnson reports the attendance of his services in Smyrna fairly good. The work is encouraging. He hopes to have some baptisms to report very soon.

A. L. Chapman reports 115 at the Sunday-school, 75 at the church service in the morning, 27 at the English service in the afternoon and 25 at the English class.

The Foreign Society needs a teacher for India. This teacher should be familiar with normal methods and should have some experience in actual work in the school-room.

F. H. Marshall reports the baptism of a young man, and an interview with a young lady to be baptized a week later. He finds work on the mission field most attractive.

The latest letters received from E. E. Faris are dated March 11. At that time he was in the new station at Bolengi. This station is very near the equator. He speaks very hopefully of the outlook.

Dr. Dye and wife reached Matadi the last of March. They were waiting for a steamer to go up to Bolengi. They were in good health and reported a pleasant voyage on a good ship under an agreeable captain.

Pukoh, China, has seen her first baptized believers among her residents. Nankin has almost weekly additions. F. E. Meigs has seen several of his boys baptized; and all other stations have seen like blessings.

Work has begun in Osaka, Japan. This is the second largest city in the empire. From that point twenty-five millions of people can be reached within twenty-four hours. R. L. Pruett and wife are now living in Osaka.

The Turkish authorities seem to be more hostile to the work than they have been for sometime past. The work of Garabed Kevorkian in Tocat is being interfered with by them. Police stand around the door to watch those who come and go. This keeps the timid away.

The Foreign Society needs a well-equipped man for Cuba. Melvin Menges is under appointment, but another is needed. Whoever goes to that field should have a good education and vigorour health and should be prepared to help make Cuba all that it can and should be. A student fresh from college is hardly qualified for that position.

M. B. Madden reports two baptisms at Fukushima. The work moves along well there. One of the teachers in the public school is a Christian and takes great interest in the Sunday-school. Mr. Madden reports the baptism of a young man in Sendai. He writes that a new school of 35 members has been organized in Fukushima Ken, a place where we had no previous work. A Christian man and his wife moved from the Fukushima Church to this new town and started the new school.

John Johnson needs some lantern slides. Many people in the United States have slides that they do not use. We would be glad if some of these were sent to him to aid him in attracting audiences.

W. P. Bentldy writes that the day school for boys in Shanghai is growing so fast that he is compelled to prepare another school room. The attendance at the Sunday morning service is twice as large as it was before the new building was erected.

G. N. Shishmanian has been making a tour of the churches throughout the empire. He reports one conversion in Bithias. It was his purpose to visit Marash, but was advised not to go there, because of the unsettled condition of the place. He reports three baptisms at Antioch.

C. E. Molland writes that the mission property at Wu Wei Cho has been destoyed by fire. This property was rented. This loss does not fall on the Society. The fire was caused by a family squabble. Neither husband nor wife would cook the breakfast, consequently a child tries his hand on the stove. He piled on the fuel and then went to the well. On his return the shed was in a blaze, and that blaze rendered some thirty families destitute.

A. McLEAN.

A Wholesale Gain.

The following shows the receipts for Foreign Missions for the first 18 days of May, compared with the corresponding time in 1898:

	1898.	1899.	Gain.
No. churches contributing	148	195	47
" S. S. "	10	11	1
" C. E. S. "	24	18	Loss 3
" Individual Offerings,	19	17	" 2
Amount,	$3,620.18	$3,937.61	$317.43

There has been a gain in the receipts from the churches as churches, of a little more than $5,000. The total receipts to date from Oct. 1st amount to $79,012, or a gain for the whole year of $8,016.67.

Salt Lake City, May 15.—One confession yesterday.—W. H. BAGBY.

FLORIDA.

Jacksonville, May 29.—Reached 100 additions in the Martin meeting last night.—J. T. BOONE.

NEBRASKA.

Bro. Green, of Bethany, Mo., has been employed by the Church of Christ at Table Rock, Neb.

CALIFORNIA.

Gridley, May 11.—I began a protracted meeting here last Friday evening. We have nine accessions to date. The meeting will continue indefinitely.—L. B. COGGINS.

COLORADO.

Denver, May 19.—We are in a splendid meeting with the Highland Church, Denver; 12 added to date. The pastor, G. K. Lewis, does the preaching and I am assisting in the music.—C. E. MILLARD.

MINNESOTA.

Worthington, May 19.—Our large tent is full of people eager to know the old gospel. Interest quite good. The sects are working hard against us. A number of additions to date.—ATWOOD AND SWEETMAN.

TEXAS.

Weatherford, May 15.—There were three confessions at our midweek service last week, two by letter and one confession yesterday morning, and two confessions last night. We are trying to do our part in winning 100,000 souls for Christ in 1899.—CHAS. E. FREEMAN.

VIRGINIA.

Manchester, May 18.—Bro. Geo. F. De Vol, of Waterloo, Iowa, recently closed a four weeks' meeting with us with 33 additions. The interest began with the first sermon and continued to its close, there being three confessions the last night.—J. A. SPENCER.

KENTUCKY.

Frankfort, May 14.—As the result of two weeks' preaching by the "resident minister," aided by his own people we have recently had 24 additions; 21 by confession. Our church is in a healthy state. I begin a meeting at Carrollton, Ky., May 15th.—GEORGE DARSIE.

INDIANA.

Zionsville, May 16.—We had a good day at Omega last Sunday. This church has never contributed to missions, but with much fear and trembling we made our plea for Home Missions and received $13.50. I know our board will receive this much above last year's collection.—WM. H. KNOTTS.

IDAHO.

Payette, May 16.—We have organized a good, strong church, a Ladies' Aid and a Bible-school. We now number 48. There are only four or five other churches in this state. I expect to start back to Iowa next week. Those wishing to correspond concerning meeting can address me at Jefferson, Iowa.—LAURENCE WRIGHT.

OHIO.

Findlay, May 16.—Last Sunday I preached on "Cross and Crescent" to Knights Templar, who attended in a body. During May I am preaching special series of sermons to young people. These sermons, by special invitation, appear in Monday Daily Courier. Work prospering. Getting ready for Children's Day.—A. M. GROWDEN.

OKLAHOMA.

Kingfisher, May 17.—Our meeting is growing in interest. Large audiences and five additions so far.—MORGAN MORGANS.

Hennessey, May 20.—We have just closed a meeting at this place of a little over three weeks' duration, with 35 additions, J. M. Monroe, of El Reno, doing the preaching. I go in a short time to assist him in a meeting at El Reno.—C. W. VAN DOLAH.

KANSAS.

Winfield, May 19.—Our four weeks' meeting closed here last night. Bro. C. M. Wickham, of Kansas City, did the preaching. The immediate results of the meeting were, seven additions by relation, a $600 mortgage paid and about $100 of other debts provided for. The last night of the meeting was our jubilee meeting when we burned the last mortgage notes.—W. T. ADAMS.

Atchison, May 19.—First Church raised its apportionment for Home Missions, which is five times more than last year.—W. S. PRIEST.

Ft. Scott, May 17.—On next Lord's day I will begin a tent meeting with Elmer T. Davis, pastor of the Christian Church, Armourdale. Expect to continue about four weeks.—V. E. RIDENOUR.

MISSOURI.

Joplin, May 19.—Since last report we have had seven additions. This makes 40 since January 1st. We are preparing now to raise our church debt, and then our next object will be to erect a new building.—W. F. TURNER.

Kansas City, May 18.—Two confessions; three baptized last Sunday. We have had additions every Sunday for over eight months at Westport Christian Church.—THOMAS J. DICKSON.

Albany, May 16.—Bro. D. D. Boyle, of Topeka, Kan., has just closed a meeting at Ridgeway, Mo., resulting in 50 additions, a quickening of the church and the raising of a debt of $1,000.—A. G. ALDERMAN.

Ridgeway, May 8.—Eleven confessions yesterday, eight young men; 27 up to date.—D. D. BOYLE.

Grant City, May 10.—Church in flourishing condition; 11 additions since April 1, at regular services.—ELLIS B. HARRIS.

Kansas City, May 12.—Had three additions at Grant City, Mo., April 23. W. H. Harris is the wide-awake pastor. Had four confessions at Fairview, Mo., April 30. Partly arranged for a pastor. Had six confessions at Prairie Point, Mo., May 7. Partly arranged for a pastor there. I go to Chicago to-night to aid Clyde Darsie in a meeting.—T. W. COTTINGHAM.

ILLINOIS.

Chicago, May 15.—Dedicated the tabernacle at Austin yesterday at 3:15 P. M., with nearly all of our city pastors present. We had a rainy day, but fine turnout, and paid up all expenses for building and work. I have a nice start on expense of the meeting. Had five added at afternoon service and three at night; two confessions, both men. Dr. Albert Buxton spoke for us at 11 A. M., and gave us a fine discourse.—CHAS. REIGN SCOVILLE.

Rantoul, May 16.—One addition at Rantoul on the 14th.—H. H. PETERS.

Shelbyville, May 15th.—One more addition to the church at Palmyra at our regular service Lord's day.—A. M. COLLINS.

Camp Point, May 15.—Three accessions at Winchester yesterday. I will supply there until August, when I will enter the evangelistic field.—R. A. OMER.

Lovington, May 10.—Have just returned from a two days' visit with Bro. Lewis Goos at Berlin. Preached two discourses and baptized two of my former Sunday-school scholars there. One baptism here recently. All departments of church work move on nicely. We expect to build this summer.—J. R. PARKER.

Sullivan, May 22.—One accession last evening. The most prominent man in the county, ex-senator, a man of ability and influence. We will let the contract for our new church within a few days. Will cost, when furnished, about $10,000.—E. W. BRICKERT.

Watseka, May 22.—Another made the good confession last evening at our regular service. Am delivering a series of Monday evening lectures to the young people of the church and this community, on "The History of the Church." The attendance and interest is good.—B. S. FERRALL.

Via Dolorosa.

BY WILLA MACLANE.

Behold, proud heart, the noble, thorn-crowned head;
The Master's kingly form now bended low
Beneath the heavy cross; the feet so slow
That leave the sharp and jagged stones dyed red;
The Son of God by howling demons led;
The flesh that shrunk beneath the scourge's blow,
With pain more fierce than human breast can know;
The crimson blood on dark Golgotha shed!
Then, Lord, forgive the fierce, rebellious heart
That dared beneath its weary load complain,
That dared deny the Father-love of God,
My heavy cross is but the smallest part
Of his for me, and shall my pride disdain
The Way of Sorrows that my Master trod?

THE EVOLUTION OF A PASTOR;

Or, Elder Brune's Experiences at Eastville.

BY A. A. HONEYWELL.

CHAPTER V.

Elder Brune called at the store as directed, received his orders for the day, and proceeded to carry them out, while Mrs. Brune attended the Ladies' Aid Society in the church parlors, where the ladies were gathered to put in the day working button-holes in cuffs and collars.

"This is a hard way to make money, it seems to me," exclaimed Mrs. Short, coming in, all in a bustle, casting aside her wraps and throwing herself into a chair. "Here are twenty-four button-holes to be worked and twelve to be bared, all for ten cents."

"That seems to be all we can do," replied Mrs. Wright. "Ten dimes make a dollar and one hundred and fifty dollars pays our pledge, or it takes fifteen hundred dozen collars to work. Let me see—fifteen hundred times twenty-four is thirty-six thousand. I'd just like to know how many stitches there are in them. I think if I had a dollar for every one I would be a millionaire." At this point in the conversation Mrs. Good offered a suggestion: "I believe it would pay us to have clam-bake or two next summer by way of variety."

"Pray, what is a clam-bake?" inquired Mrs. Brune. "Don't you know what a clam-bake is?" exclaimed several.

"I never heard of such a thing before," replied Mrs. Brune. "Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise," quoted Miss West, who detested clam-bakes.

"A clam-bake," explained Mrs. Short, "is accomplished like this: First, a hole is dug in the ground, then partly filled with stones, upon which a fire is kindled. When the stones are sufficiently heated, the coals are raked off and washed, clams in wire baskets are put on these heated rocks. Besides clams, are put in Irish and sweet potatoes, fish, chicken, corn and whatever else is desired. These are covered with straw or fodder and this is well covered with dirt, so as to retain the heat. When the clams have cooked sufficiently the 'bake' is opened as carefully as possible, so as to keep some, at least, of the dirt from getting in the 'bake.' The 'bake' is then placed upon the tables and the people help themselves to such as they like, with little ceremony."

"I don't think I should like to eat victuals cooked in that fashion, and I am quite sure Mr. Brune wouldn't even taste it; he is so fastidious in his eating."

"Oh!" replied Mrs. Good, "it is considered very delicious; people will go miles to a clam-bake and cheerfully pay fifty cents or a dollar a plate."

"I should like to see one. You know Mr. Brune and myself have never lived in the East before, so this is all new to us, but I very much fear I could not eat such a dish, much less relish it."

"There comes Mrs. Olds," exclaimed Mrs. Short, peeping through the shutters. "I'll have to give her a good scolding for being so late suppose we all take a hand in the matter."

As Mrs. Olds entered the room, she was accordingly met with a perfect cyclone of reproofs; such as, "We'll fine you fifty cents for being so late;" "Better late than never, but better on time than late;" "Did you wash your supper dishes before you came?" "You have forgotten your recent sermon on promptness;" "Can't pay you full wages to-day," etc., etc.

To all these good-natured sallies she turned the deaf ear of contempt. She was not in a good humor and didn't propose to get in one until she was ready. So she leisurely took off her wraps, and having carefully viewed the situation, proceeded to give her verdict: "You seem to be doing more work with your tongues than with your hands."

"We are waiting for an example worthy of imitation," rejoined Miss West.

Mrs. Good knew the temperaments of both ladies, and fearing a personal encounter with tongues, sharpened with spite as weapons, sought to change the current of discussion by introducing a new subject. "What are we to do for a janitor? Bro. Bro. Smith has gone to the city to work and has left us without a janitor." This called out an answer from Mrs. Line, whose husband was church treasurer, to the effect that there was barely sufficient money coming into the treasury to meet the running expenses, without the janitor's fees, most of which went of course to Elder Brune, and that her husband thought it would be a good idea for the ladies to sweep the church and hire some one to make fires and ring the bell.

"I think," said Mrs. Brune, "that we could sweep the church, but as to hiring the rest done, we seem to have all we can do to meet our pledge."

Up to the present Mrs. Olds had been silent, but it was only the silence preceding a storm, as was evident by her remarks:

"I for one don't propose to do any sweeping of the church, nor to help hire a janitor, either, and neither Mr. Olds nor Mr. Brown expects us to. They have a man in view who will do the janitor work without any extra expense to us. So I don't think we need to worry ourselves about it."

"That is good news indeed," remarked Mrs. Wright, "but pray who is it that is so good as to do this work without pay?"

"I don't know about his goodness," replied Mrs. Olds. "In fact, I can't say that he has offered his services, but the church has hired a man to work for them, and pay him fifty dollars a month, for which it is getting precious little in return. He is getting nearly all the money we raise, and it is no more than right that he should do the janitor's work, and the elders will so inform him."

There was an uncomfortable silence following this uncharitable speech. Some were astounded to think that such a thing could be thought of, while others were too afraid of Mrs. Olds' tongue to make any reply, seeing she was in such an ill-humor and determined to hurt some one's feelings. As for Mrs. Brune, she could hardly contain herself, but with an effort maintained silence. But there was one who, having recovered from her surprise, did not propose to hold her tongue, and that was Miss West, whose æsthetical ideas rebelled against a preacher soiling his hands tending the fire and then going into the pulpit to handle the Word of God: "If Elder Brune submits to be bossed by the elders to the extent of doing the janitor work he isn't the man I thought he was."

"I'd like to know how he can help himself," retorted Mrs. Olds. "He will either have to do it or get out."

"I think," said Mrs. Good, who had, figuratively speaking, stepped in between the combatants again to act as peacemaker, "that there is some misunderstanding about the matter, and that the question will be settled to the satisfaction of both parties, and that Elder Brune will not need to do the janitor work. I am willing to take my turn at it."

"You may be sure," said Mrs. Brune, who had to ease her mind a little at least, "that Mr. Brune will never do the janitor work. He has suffered already a multitude of such indignities, and there will have to be a change, or he will certainly not stay much longer. But this entire question is now being considered by my husband and the elders, and I am in hopes that the matter will be amicably settled."

"If Mr. Brune thinks he can pull the wool over the eyes of my husband and Brother Brown he is certainly fooled. They will never accept his absurd pretensions."

It was evident that Mrs. Olds would have the last word, and while all the rest sympathized with Elder and Mrs. Brune, yet they were so accustomed to allowing Mrs. Olds to have her own way that they let the matter drop, and sought to restore good feeling by talking on other matters; but after Mrs. Olds had gone—for she departed early—they one and all eased their minds by assuring Mrs. Brune that it was only Mrs. Olds' way, and she should not worry over the matter, for they didn't think the elders would make any such demand, and they sincerely hoped that Elder Brune would not think of leaving them, for they had become much attached to them both, and thought they were just the ones for the place.

All this was very comforting to Mrs. Brune, who had begun to think she had no friends in Eastville; and thus out of her sorest trial came the sweetest comfort.

The Storm of Life.

A. R. ADAMS.

O, calm the waves upon life's troubled sea,
For I am tossed about and sore afraid!
Dear Lord, in my distress I cry to thee,
For thou alone hast power to give me aid.

O, calm the storm that's raging in my soul,
And fill my heart with happiness and peace!
At thy command the billows cease to roll,
And at thy word the raging storm must cease.

A Temperance Lesson.

The club idea, like many other European notions, good, bad and indifferent, has reached India. Together with a missionary friend I went one evening toward sundown to visit a Hindoo club in the environs of Madura. A beautiful flower-embowered walk led up to the billiard hall and reading room, where the latest European and American as well as Hindoo papers and magazines occupied the files. Behind this building another flower-lined walk led to the splendid tennis courts, where white-clad and white-turbaned Brahmans of large and muscular physique were playing the game, which may well be called the national game of all lands. They were too dignified to chase the balls, however, and darker-skinned Hindoos of lower caste ran after them and returned them to the players.

Just beyond the tennis courts was the refreshment hall of the club, and, being courteously invited to go up on the roof, we ascended to the flat housetop (just such a place as that on which Peter had his famous dream, I suppose,) and were followed by three courtly Brahmans of high degree.

At first the conversation turned upon the all-absorbing silver question, which was agitating India even more than America. My hosts were anxious to find out America's attitude toward bimetallism. In the course of the conversation I showed them an American silver coin. They were anxious to know what historical character was represented by the head of the coin. When I explained that it was neither Martha Washington nor Mrs. Lincoln, but that it was simply the Goddess of Liberty, I saw that they were somewhat surprised; and for the first time it struck me as somewhat odd that a Christian people should emblazon their coins with the figure of a mythological deity.

Then the conversation turned on the temperance question, and I was obliged to blush in good earnest for the branch of the Aryan race which I represented before my brothers of another branch. In the most perfect English—pronunciation, inflection, modulation, the best Bostonese—they complained pathetically and bitterly of the evils of intemperance which the government had forced upon them.

"We Brahmans are teetotallers by religion, custom, birth, and tradition," said one; "but the government under which we live is forcing the liquor curse upon us against our will. Even when we struggle to free ourselves, it is no use. Our rulers think more of revenue than they do of our souls and bodies, and would send us all to perdition for the sake of raising the taxes more easily. We are trying to get a law passed to prohibit the sale of liquor in any district where three-fourths of the district or city ward petition against it. But even that the officials will not allow; and our country will be cursed by liquor, we fear, in spite of all."

"But what happens," said I, "when a Brahman drinks intoxicating liquor?"

"He is excommunicated at once," was the prompt reply, "if it is known. No Brahman drinks intoxicants except in a secret and underhand way."

"But do you mean to say that no liquors or wines are sold or drunk in your club?" I inquired again.

"That is what we mean," they replied. "No drop of liquor has ever been sold, or ever shall be sold, so long as we are in control. In fact, the question that is agitating the clubs now is whether bottled lemonade and sodawater shall be sold, and after a warm discussion it has been decided by a large majority in the negative. We do not wish to introduce foreign drinks of any kind. Soda is associated with whiskey and brandy, and we will not have the taint of a saloon about our club. Coffee and tea are good enough for us."

When I said goodby to my hospitable temperance hosts, they asked me to write a sentiment in their club book. My sentiment was, "I rejoice that there is one club on the face of the earth where liquor is not sold, one club house that does not reek with the fumes of wine and tobacco."—F. E. Clark, in C. E. World.

The Woes of the Lady Ant.

"Did you ever suffer from a naturalist?" asked a thin, eager little voice.

Gerald, his hat drawn over his eyes, was nearly asleep. He roused up at this, considered a minute, and then said, decidedly:

"Yes, I have."

"I'm so glad!" exclaimed the little voice. "I mean, of course, glad to find a sympathizer. Now, what do you suppose a naturalist does with all the information he collects from us? Does he put it into books?"

"Of course he does," replied Gerald. "That's just what I complain of. He might collect all he wanted if he threw it into the river. But he puts it into books for miserable people to have to study. That's the part I object to."

"You are quite wrong," responded the little voice, with dignity. "You look at me! I am a lady ant."

Gerald looked a long time before he saw the lady ant. She was sitting upon a blade of grass. When he saw her lift up her handkerchief and wipe her streaming eyes he exclaimed:

"Well, I never!"

"I suppose not," said the lady ant, dabbing at her eyes the while, "but I have!"

Then she groaned deeply.

"A naturalist captured me, with a score or more of my family, last Saturday. We were gamboling joyously on a cabbage leaf. He put us on a table and proceeded to try experiments with us. He laid a beautiful blue bottle down on the table, but when we tried to carry it away our united strength could not move it. It was pinned on a cork!

"Then he gave my friends some strange liquor to drink, which made them act in a most distressing way. Presently they fell down as if they were dead. Then the naturalist put some strange ants down beside us. These strangers, seeing the unfortunate condition of my friends, picked them up one by one and dropped them over the edge of the table into a trench of water which the naturalist had there. My poor friends were drowned!

"He tried many other experiments with me," continued the lady ant, mournfully. "He gave me heavy burdens to carry and took them away just as I had struggled with them to the door of my home. He seemed to think it very strange and interesting to watch me go to fetch my friends to help carry home a dead cricket which he gave me. But when I brought my friends back he had taken the cricket away! Then they naturally thought I had deceived them, and they attacked me and beat me sorely. And he watched them do it, yet never interfered nor gave us back the cricket he had taken away. It is such cruelties as these of which I complain," she moaned.

"But as for you," sharply said the lady ant, "I can't see what you have to complain of. You are almost as big as the naturalist. He has not taken a cricket away from you, has he? No? Well, then, you have little indeed of which to complain. All you do is to read about it out of a book! Bah!"

Her disgust cured the lady ant of her sorrow. She shook herself, ran around the blade of grass and disappeared.

Gerald stared for a few minutes, thinking she would come back. Then he put his hat on hard, ran into the house and picked up the Natural History he had thrown into the corner.

"I must turn to the chapter on 'Ants' the first thing,' he muttered. "How remarkable such things are! How very interesting!"—Chicago Record.

A patient in an English insane asylum imagined himself dead, and nothing could drive the delusion out of his brain. One day the physician had a happy thought, and said to him:

"Did you ever see a dead man bleed?"

"No," he replied.

"Did you ever hear of a dead man bleeding?"

"No."

"Well, if you will permit me, I will try an experiment with you, and see if you bleed or not."

The patient gave his consent; the doctor whipped out his scalpel and drew a little blood.

"There," he said, "you see that you bleed; that proves that you are not dead."

"Not at all," the patient instantly replied; "that proves that dead men can bleed."

Blindfolded and alone I stand
With unknown thresholds on each hand;
The darkness deepens as I grope,
Afraid to fear, afraid to hope;
Yet this one thing I learn to know,
Each day more surely as I go,
That doors are opened, ways are made,
Burdens are lifted or are laid
By some great law unseen and still,
Unfathomed purpose to fulfill,
"Not as I will."

American Cruisers in Syria.

Life would not be so very well worth living along these shores were it not for the American cruisers. The official Turk has a dread of these snow-white steamers which is most salutary. It is well that this is so, for in quite recent times the American Consuls and Vice-Consuls have had a hard time of it.

When the Minister of any country is a close personal friend of the Sultan the other citizens of that country in the outlying districts had better take to the woods. The idea seems to have got abroad among the Kaimakams and other officials that while it was dangerous to meddle with an Englishman one could do pretty much what one liked with an American. The cruisers, however, mitigated this belief, and also did things which failed to appear in the official dispatches to the Government at Washington, I don't know in what form the captain of a cruiser sends in his report, but perhaps it might take some such shape as this in reporting an incident that actually occurred:

"The Kaimakam of the port of Nix having thrown some obstacles in the way of the Rev. Mr. Blank, an American citizen, in relation to the school established at this place, the Rev. Mr. Blank made complaint to me through his vice-consul, I happening to be in the port for a few hours. When the Kaimakam visited me I expostulated with him, and explained to him the right of domicile under which the Rev. Mr. Blank is allowed to prosecute his duties in this place. The Kaimakam admitted that he had acted without knowledge of the law, and gave me his assurance that the rights of the Rev. Mr. Blank would not be again infringed."

That sort of thing would read very nicely in Washington, and could be filed away without doing anybody any harm. A little error had been committed by a Turkish official; his attention had been called to it, and he expressed his regret, making instant amends. Now, what really happened was this: The Kaimakam had made up his mind that the Rev. Mr. Blank was to be driven out of the port of Nix by fair means or foul, and so his life was made a round of torment. He complained to the vice-consul, who reported the matter to his Minister at Constantinople, who returned a soothing answer, saying that perhaps the Rev. Mr. Blank had not been as tactful toward the officials as he should have been, and asking the vice-consul to smoothe the matter out and not make a fuss.

The wink was tipped to the captain of a cruiser, whose name I omit, and that cruiser promptly dropped around to the port of Nix. The longboat was lowered almost before the cruiser had stopped, a young naval officer decked out in full uniform landed with a formidable array of stalwart sailors to row his boat, and commanded the Kaimakam, with his chief underlings, to come aboard within the hour and have a little talk with the captain.

As the cruiser was cleared for action, and as force is the only thing a Kaimakam understands, he came obsequiously on board with his following. The marines were drawn up armed in formidable array, and the trembling Kaimakam was received by the stern captain in full regimentals, standing with his hand resting on the muzzle of a quick-firing gun.

"Look here," said the captain to the interpreter, "tell this man that I don't talk Turkish worth a hang, but this thing does," whereupon he patted fondly the barrel of the gun. "If he doesn't promise instantly to let alone a citizen of the United States, I'm here to shell his town."

When this truculent message was translated to the trembling Kaimakam that official at once prostrated himself on the white boards of the cruiser's deck, beat his forehead against them, and swore by Allah and the Prophet that he would hereafter be the best friend the Rev. Mr. Blank ever had. And it is a fact that the Rev. Mr. Blank has been unmolested ever since, while it is another fact that the captain of that cruiser greatly distinguished himself in the recent Spanish-American war, as, indeed, a man who could talk like that would be very apt to do.—Evening Post.

Saturday Talk Series of Biographical Sketches
And Short Stories for Children

BY MRS. LAURA GEROULD CRAIG.

PUBLISHED IN SIX VOLUMES. PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

Vol. I. Little Presidents.
Vol. II. Little Kings.
Vol. III. Little Queens.
Vol. IV. Little Orators.
Vol. V. Little Generals.
Vol. VI. Little Statesmen.

"THE FAREWELL KISS"—ILLUSTRATION FROM "LITTLE QUEENS."

The author thoroughly understands the mental wants of the child, and in these volumes these wants are happily met. The biographical sketches of the great men of the world, while they were growing into greatness, are always fascinating to the children.

These stories are presented in such an attractive manner that the mind of the child will retain them all through life. The little folks that will carefully read these stories will be in possession of many of the little incidents in the lives of a large number of the great men and women who have blessed the world with their lives. These little volumes should be placed in the homes of this country to bless children. The little ones of the family should know the facts given in this series of biographical stories, and thus early in life they can be taught that the "Lives of great men all remind us we can make our lives sublime."

Shop Talk.

The C. E. World gives the following extract from the report of a brakeman concerning an accident:

"'The con was flipping the tissues in the doghouse. The hind shack was freezing a hot hub near the hind end. Tallow Pot was cracking diamonds in the tank. Eagle Eye was down greasing the pig, and I was bending the rails when they hit us.'

"It was evidently a choice bit of railroad slang, and was translated by an old-timer in the office as follows:

"'The conductor was examining the train order in the cupola. The rear brakeman was cooling a journal. The fireman was breaking coal. The engineer was oiling the engine and the head brakeman was throwing a switch when the trains came together.'"

This reminds us of a remark we once heard a reporter make to the city editor of a daily paper. He said: "Say, I fell down on that wreck. The main guy did the calm act and gave me a bag of hot air, and all the willies were shivering for their bread and milk." Translated this meant: "I was unable to secure any account of that railroad wreck. The general manager refused to talk about the matter, save to deny that there had been any wreck, and the clerks and assistants dared not tell what they knew for fear of discharge."

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS, PLATTSBURG, MO.

The Scheme.

At the time appointed all sat in the parlor of Horace Blount's home. George Weston, as president of the Mizzouryville Advance Society, was seated before a table at the end of the room, while the secretary, Tony Stubbs, had his seat at the end of the same table. Horace Blount, the oldest member, sat with impressive dignity near the sofa, while on the sofa were the three girls, Jennie Weston, Tattie Marsh and Mildred Taylor. Jim Dancy had taken possession of the piano stool, and he turned himself about every once in a while. As soon as Tony had read the minutes of the last meeting, he left the table and went to a chair close to Jim's stool. Horace immediately cast a suspicious eye upon these irrepressible youths. The program began by quotations from famous authors, and as each had hunted for a touching sentiment or witty thought, the exercise was very entertaining. Then came short sketches of what had been read during the past week. Tony had condensed the first five pages of Dickens' "History of England" into half a page. Jennie Weston had a longer essay on Irving's "Washington," and George recalled from memory what he had read in Hume. Mildred Taylor had written in prose the story of the first part of "Hamlet," and Horace Blount, who was also partial to poetry, had done the same with the opening lines of "Evangeline." Poor Tattie Marsh, who had never read anything except her lessons before this society began, did her best with a History of the United States, and she had succeeded in catching and herding together all the big words in the five pages, without knowing exactly what they meant. Jim Dancy, another fresh convert to the delights of literature, had unluckily fallen in with Hallam's "Middle Ages," the book Mr. Weston had lent to his parents to break them from novel reading. The book had succeeded so well that Jim had a warm affection for it. The following is his essay:

"The First Five Pages of Hallam's 'Middle Ages:' This is a splendid work for our Society, because there are so many notes at the bottom of each page in fine type (which nobody has to read) that it leaves only about half of each page to get over. Besides this, there is a whole-page picture with the other side blank, leaving only three reading half pages. Besides, the type is big, and that is a great point in history. The fifth page ends in the middle of a sentence. The first page describes the whole world and who lived in different parts; the rest is about Clovis and his sons. There is also Vandals and a Arian sect. Clovis, he got religious and joined the church, so he went and fought Alaric and whipped him and took away his land. There was little figures scattered over the lines to show which note to hunt up, but I didn't pay no attention to 'em."

The program was completed by a calling of the roll, to see who had kept all five of the resolutions. No one had failed. Then a vigorous discussion ensued as to whether pictures and blank pages counted, and it was decided in the negative. However, as Jim had not known this, his past record should stand.

Tony Stubbs now arose, and standing close to Jim Dancy he said, "Members of the Society: Mr. Horace Blount has a scheme to propose to us, which I am sure will afford us much entertainment. Before I resume my seat and yield the floor to him, I wish to commend the good order that has prevailed this evening." As he spoke the last word he slipped a button down Jim's neck and sat down. Jim gave a start, but did not turn his head. Horace arose.

"This is the scheme," he said, "and though some of you may not care for it, I have hopes that others will like it. I have just bought a second-hand foot-press and a big tin bucket of type, and I intend to print a little paper, say once a month. Now, I would like for this society to go in with me, and help edit and print it. I know how to set type, and you boys can soon learn. Every Saturday we can put in an hour or two at it, and be learning something at the same time we are having fun. You girls can help write for the magazine little stories, or whatever is good; and you can correct the proof, and give advice and help get subscribers. This is not all. We will communicate with the members of the Advance Society in other states, ask them to contribute pieces, get subscribers for us, etc. It will be a paper for young people, run by young people. Boys and girls will take it from Maine to California! It will be a new idea in journalism. A column will be devoted to an account of the Advance Society. New members and those on the List of Honor will be published in it. We will have a continued story—Mildred is a good hand at that. And Jennie can do a piece of poetry. And if the magazine is not very fine, people will make allowance. All of you who care to go into this will be on the staff. Of course, I will be editor, since I bought the press and things and paid $12 for 'em."

"After that declaration," said Tony, rising, "it would be mere form to nominate you for editor. I will go in on this scheme." And he slipped another button —the fifth one—down Jim's neck. Tony had been secretly amazed that Jim Dancy made no protest against these buttons. Each time he would give a start, but he never looked at Tony. In the meantime all the other members approved the scheme. "I move we adjourn," said Horace, highly gratified at his success, "so we can go to my office, and I will show you the press and everything." "I second the motion," said Tony, this time dropping a handful of buttons down Jim's neck. The motion carried unanimously, and President Weston announced, "The society is now adjourned." Hardly had he spoken the words before Jim Dancy wheeled upon Tony Stubbs. Tony, seeing vengeance in Jim's eyes on account of the buttons, fled from the room. Jim pursued him wildly around the house, leaving behind him a trail of buttons which slipped out of his trowsers' legs. George, who was watching the race, declared that it wouldn't take Indians to trace Jim Dancy's footsteps!

Horace led the others into what he called his "office." It was, in fact, his bedroom, but nobody would have thought of that, although a folding bed stood in one corner. His mother, who knew he expected company, had been trying to clear a path through the apartment. "Now, she has moved all my things!" sighed Horace. By "things" he meant books, papers, type, blank paper, etc. Mrs. Blount greeted them cheerfully, apologizing for the terrible confusion in which they found her boy's room. On the floor was a big pan full of type which was soaking in lye water. In a corner stood the press, as high as Horace's head. On the top iron shelf was the "roller," while in a can was a sticky mass to be stirred with a stick; this was the "printer's ink." On a goods box, at the window, was a homemade "case," formed into little boxes in which to "distribute" the type. Horace told them that the boxes did not come in regular order, with "a" at the beginning and "z" at the last. The biggest box was for "e," as this is most used, while "s," "t," "l" and "o" held prominent positions. The next largest box was for spaces. Horace explained that spaces are shorter type than letters, and are placed between each word, where they leave little blank spaces. But sometimes they fall to a level of the letters, by mistake; then they leave a black mark. The "m quads," he said, were simply very thick spaces, that you put at the beginning of a paragraph. Then he showed with pride the iron boxes that you hold in one hand, while with the other you put the type in them; only the boxes are called "sticks," and spelling the words is called "setting up type." These "sticks" only have three sides; when one "stick" is full, you carefully draw the set-up lines out on a level board, and push them up to other set-up lines, thus gradually forming a column.

"Our first work," said Horace, "is to distribute this clean, dry type. By distributing we mean putting letters of the same kind off by themselves." He pointed to a lot of type which had been cleaned so that the little letters standing out on the tiny sticks fairly glistened. He divided this type into separate piles, and the members each took a pile, after carefully wrapping it up in old newspaper. "Distribute them into little packages," said the editor, "and write on each package what letter it is." After further discussing their plans, the members separated. The three girls went to Jennie Weston's room, as it was still early in the afternoon. They sat on the floor like Arabs, with the type between them, and began the work of "distributing."

In the meantime George remained with Horace Blount. Presently Tony Stubbs came in looking very red and wet in the face, while Jim strolled after him with a satisfied expression.

"Hello, Buttons," said George, addressing Jim, "what have you been doing to Tony?"

"Ask the rain-barrel at ye corner of ye domicyle," said Jim, waving his arm theatrically.

"Pshaw!" said Tony, still wiping his face on a very questionable handkerchief. "Here, tell us about these types."

The trial of Jesus assumed a twofold form, in harmony with the twofold nature of his mission—to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile. He was first brought before the authorities of his own nation, and this examination itself was of a double character. Immediately upon his arrest he was taken to the palace of Annas, the ex-high priest, who still held the supreme place in all but name, and wielded the power of the office—from which he had been deposed — through the reigning high priest, his son-in-law, Caiaphas. In this informal meeting no sentence could be pronounced, as it was necessary for the Sanhedrin, in its capacity as the highest court of the nation, to hold its sessions in the daytime. But all the preliminary steps could be taken, and the examination brought to such a point that it needed only a brief session of the council in the morning to complete its work (Matt. 27:1; Mark 15:1; Luke 14:55-64). This sitting was held under the presidency of Caiaphas, and after the formal ratification of the dark work of the previous night, it was ready to carry out its purpose, the death of Jesus.

But Judea was not a free state. Rome, the mistress of the world, was sovereign here, and the Sanhedrin had only advisory functions. It could sentence a prisoner to death, but was powerless to execute that sentence, and was compelled to hand its condemned victims over to the procurator for his official action. The Roman procurator of Judea at this period was Pontius Pilate, whose residence was at Cæsarea, but who, like his predecessors, was accustomed to come to Jerusalem with a strong force of soldiers on the occasion of the great feasts, which brought tens of thousands to the city, and might be the cause of serious disturbance unless prompt military action were taken. He was accordingly in Jerusalem at this time, the period of the Passover, and to him the priests took their condemned prisoner as soon as their formal sitting was finished.

But they were aware that the accusation which they had used to legalize the condemnation of Jesus would have no weight with Pilate. While their hatred to Jesus, on account of his popularity, his open rebukes of their sins, and their fear of his growing power, was the real cause of their action against him, they had endeavored to give a color of right procedure by bringing against him the charge of blasphemy in claiming to be the Son of God. That they felt the hollowness of this charge is shown by the violent and forced behavior of the high priest in the trial (Luke 14:55f.). But it was sufficient for their purpose. But they knew that to the procurator they must give some more reasonable charge, unless they should be able to secure his sentence to the death of Jesus on simple presentation of their demand, without being able to justify their action. It would depend on the mood of Pilate, and perhaps they thought that by going early he would be the more willing to dispense with an inquiry, as wishing to avoid the inconvenience of mixing himself up in the affairs of a people whom he was known to despise. They had in reserve, therefore, the charge that Jesus had called himself a king, which was treasonable, and required attention at the hands of the Roman Government, as being a menace against the power of Cæsar.

But these Jews, who had no scruples against taking the life of this innocent man, were unwilling to enter the pretorium or judgment hall, because it was a Gentile structure and might impart ceremonial pollution.† It is strange that the strict observance of rules and rubrics is no safeguard against sins of the gravest nature. Men who are most strict in their adherence to prescribed form or doctrine are sometimes wholly lacking in fidelity to the weightier matters, such as righteousness, justice, kindness. It is a barren and valueless religion that makes one careful only in conformity to fixed regulations or opinions, and forgetful of the life of the spirit, which may be quite crushed within.

When Pilate heard of their presence, he went out to listen to their plea. But when they asked for the death of their prisoner, he overthrew their hopes of an easy success by demanding their accusation. They knew that the one they had in reserve would appear incredible to the governor as he looked on Jesus, and they tried to secure their demand by insistence. The fact that they had found this man guilty was sufficient, they argued. Pilate cut them short by saying, "Very well, then, take your prisoner and punish him according to your own law." This, of course, compelled them to go into the whole case, for they wished nothing less than the death of Jesus, and the Roman law permitted them only the penalties of the synagogue. Here, then, was the situation which Jesus had foreseen. He would be handed over to the Gentiles and put to death (Matt. 20:19). That meant crucifixion, for the Jewish manner of executing criminals was by stoning.

The next scene presented by John is the interview between Pilate and Jesus. During all the dreadful ordeal of that morning, terrible for what it contained of mistreatment, but even more because of the certainty of what was to come, Jesus had remained calm and submissive, waiting the appointed end. He knew that this was the only way of redemption. Up this steep ascent to Calvary lay the only path to the objects of his ministry. All the shrinking of the flesh, all the terror which the shadow of death cast upon him, had passed away, and he met every fresh discovery of hatred or injustice with quiet fortitude, in the strength of his divine purpose. Much passed of which no record has been left us in the fourth Gospel. The Jews presented their charge of treason, with such proofs of the seditious character of Jesus' work as they were able to command. Satisfied of the weakness and emptiness of their case, they resolved to supply in obstinate persistence what they lacked in their cause, and they knew enough of Pilate's character to believe that they could at last wrest the condemnation they sought from his reluctant hands.

The interview of Jesus and Pilate is one of the masterstrokes among New Testament pictures. A judge convinced that his prisoner is innocent, yet anxious to give a semblance of examination; angry with the Jewish people on general principles, and desirous of thwarting the purpose of their rulers, but scarcely knowing how to accomplish his purpose. And so he asked questions in an aimless way, as though seeking to find an escape and scarcely listening to the answers. Of the main charge, that that Jesus was a king, or was trying to make himself such, he must take notice, but how? The whole bearing of Jesus gave it the lie. He might be a fanatic, but a king he certainly was not, and when the procurator asked the question Jesus almost seemed to rebuke him by saying, "Do you really ask for your own satisfaction, or as compelled to give credence to their charge." Pilate felt the wrong of the situation and referred to the accusation. Then Jesus uttered the words which have always been the key to his supreme purpose and have rebuked every attempt to obtain earthly dominion in his name. On the frontlets of his church must be written, "My kingdom is not temporal, worldly, political." Any church that seeks to wield sovereign power over the kingdom of this world in the name of him who uttered these words is simply not the Church of Christ.

But Jesus is not less a king that he rejects the smaller rule of an earthly kingdom. His empire is over the minds of men, their hearts and effections. Before Pilate he affirmed his kingship in this higher sense. He is king in the realm of truth. His authority is that of appeal to the highest in human nature. His is not the rule of an autocrat or tyrant, who is to be obeyed simply because he commands. He never asks men for such a surrender, and no preacher or teacher truly interprets him who so affirms. His is the authority of a pilot who commands because he knows the path, and to refuse him obedience is to incur shipwreck. His is the authority or a physician who commands because he knows what are the doors of life and death, to disobey whom means to defy nature. The service of Jesus is a reasonable service, which enlists the whole life of man, mind, heart and body. Jesus desires no "blind obedience" as some religious orders have demanded of their members, but he would have every man "know the truth" and by the truth be made free. Christianity is not a religion which demands the surrender of thought, the abnegation of judgment, the abandonment of reason. It rather demands the consideration of its claims by the highest tribunal of the soul; it asks alone for a fair hearing and then makes its appeal to the nature of man as capable of a free and righteous choice. Jesus rules only over free men, devoted to him because they know him to be the King, absolute Lord of truth, absolute Master of life and death.

Pilate could understand none of these things. Power he understood and represented, the power that governs and crushes, but truth was an abstraction, a subject for fruitless debates in the schools of Stoics and Epicureans. With his half contemptuous, half curious question on his lips, and without waiting for its answer, he went forth from the prisoner who was still the Judge of the procurator and the people, to face the expectant and impatient crowd of scrupulous legalists who were seeking this man's life. Pilate did not understand his ideas, but he knew he was no king in the only sense a Roman could comprehend. This mild, worn, bruised Galilean was no fierce patriot whom Rome needed to fear. He was determined to release him both because he knew him innocent, and because he had no liking for those clamorous priests who were waiting at the door. He therefore determined to propose the usual liberation of a prisoner, a custom of the Passover season, and to suggest that Jesus be the one selected. But he was unprepared for the shrewdness with which the rulers set aside his proposal with the demand that if any one was to be released it should not be Jesus, but rather a bandit named Barabbas, some adventurer of the Robin Hood type, whose deeds of bravado had appeared to the popular imagination. And thus the scene closes. Jesus calm, patient, prepared; Pilate perplexed; baffled, angry; the crowd led by the priests and scribes persistent, determined, eager. The choice between Christ and Barabbas had been made, as it must be by every man.

*Sunday-school Lesson for May 28, 1899—Christ Before Pilate (John 18:28-40). Golden Text—I find no fault with him (John 19:4). Lesson Outline—1. Pilate and the priests (28-32); 2. Jesus and Pilate (33-38a); 3. Jesus or Barabbas (38b, 39).

†It seems probable that the phrase, "but might eat the Passover," in verse 28, is a gloss inserted by a later writer who had not compared the narratives sufficiently to perceive that the Passover had been eaten on the preceding evening. This suggestion relieves the seeming disagreement of the fourth Gospel with the others, and removes the ground for the controversies regarding so simple a matter as the date of the Passover.

TOPIC FOR JUNE 4.

WHEAT AND TARES.

(Matt. 13:24-30.)

Jesus here sets forth the great principle of toleration of the evil for the sake of the good. God once spared a great city full for the sake of one man. Those, therefore, who would destroy society because of its evils must bear in mind that the good are mingled with the evil. Must the good suffer also?

The doctrine of the social organism is here set forth. All are related. You cannot pull up the tares without rooting out the wheat, for the roots of all are intermingled. Society is a unit. Paul compares it to a body with many members, all having different offices, but all bound closely in unity. So society is held together for the sake of the good. Anarchy would destroy both evil and good.

Nevertheless, the sifting time will come. Some day, somewhere, wheat and tares must be threshed apart. Good and evil cannot forever dwell together. Light and darkness have no fellowship with each other. Sometime all evil must perish. Sometime all good must triumph.

But it is not ours too hastily to make the separation. It is not for a Christian to separate himself from the world, but to remain in the world, living side by side with evil and trying to better the world as best we may. In the world, but not overcome by it; in the thick of life, but unspotted by it—this is the Christian's position.

There is a river in the sea. It flows from the west coast of Africa across the Atlantic and up the east coast of America, then across our northern ocean to the shores of England, and everywhere this gulfstream flows it tempers the air, mollifies the climate, ripens the fruits. So with the church in the world. It is intimately connected with the world, flows through the world, is made up of the same elements as the world, and yet it is distinct from the world. Its influence is always helpful, wholsome, mollifying.

And as to our own hearts, fellow-Endeavorers, what is growing there? Are more tares there or more wheat, more evil thoughts or more good? Now is the day of judgment for evil thoughts; separate them now; bind and burn them now; cleanse and elevate the thoughts of our hearts now. To-day is the day of salvation.

A Just Decision of a Judge. William J. Long, County Judge of Thayer County, Neb., gave the following as his decision on an important question of the day. The Judge thus expressed his views: "I have used Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer in the family for about twenty years. We have raised thirteen children, and never paid a doctor bill, except for the setting of a broken limb, which the Vitalizer could not set. It meets, however, all other emergencies, and my wife says she cannot keep house without it." So far for the learned Judge. We also take pleasure in endorsing his statement, as we have heard frequent mention of the merits of this remedy.

The Essential Christ.

By H. L. Willett, Director.

The study of the life and teachings of Jesus is interesting and profitable as a simple investigation of history, literature, or human thought; for those who look at the teachings of the Savior from this point alone would probably regard them merely as the utterances of a man, though no doubt the holiest and wisest of the race. It is no doubt true that many people study the life of Jesus as an event of history, and are profoundly convinced of his divine character and teachings, and yet their interest is purely historical. The series of facts which go to make up this life-story is like no other, and their effort to understand the relation of part to part, to master the events and dates, is careful and thorough, pursued with edthusiasm and retained or enlarged with a certain degree of pride and satisfaction.

Others there are who are students of literature, and being Christians they perceive in the Gospel records books of profound literary interest. Such books the world nowhere else possesses. Such beautiful and lofty portraiture is not to be found elsewhere. These books are the most charming and the most influential that men have read. Similar, also, is the judgment of those who compare the teachings of Jesus with those of other great religious teachers. He has made himself master of men's minds and affections as have no others and from all the speculations of the sage of Iran, the prophet of Islam, or the philosopher of China, they return to sit at the feet of him who spoke the sermon on the mount.

The Christian notes with pleasure all these tokens of the world's admiration for his Master, but he is not satisfied. For those who only study the gospel story because of its historical interest, its literary charm or its philosophical depth have not touched the fringe of that divine power which lies in Christ to redeem the world. Such interest as has been named is not to be despised, for it may lead to something deeper and more valuable. Men have been brought to find pardon and peace through the Savior whose only thought at first was that of readers who regarded the story of his life worth reading twice, or who enjoyed the diction of the parables, or who wished to compare the teachings of Jesus with those of the rabbis. But if this be the limit of progress, and the student remains content with these things, his work is merely external, and he moves evermore in a circle outside the essential influences of Jesus. There were many who came to see and hear during the personal ministry of our Lord, who were profoundly impressed by the novelty of his words and the enthusiasm with which he spoke of the kingdom, who were never the better for it all, because they never entered the real circle of his spirit and purpose.

We have studied the character of Jesus to little profit if we have not already discovered that what he desires of us is likeness to himself, in order that our lives, like his, may be perfect, full, complete. This is quite possible for us, in so far as his life was human; and it was completely human in those elements which we can comprehend. The divine mystery of his nature he intended to be no barrier to our recognition of him as completely one with us in all save sin. He desires us to have the same profound faith in God as that which he possessed; to believe in our fellowmen as he believed in them, and their possibility of redemption; to depend much on the divine aid received through prayer to cultivate the nature, till it is free from all unlovely, uncharitable, selfish elements, as was his. He wanted his disciples, and he wants us, to realize that what he is we may become, and that what we may become we may begin to become to-day.

Only when we have the mind in us that was also in Christ Jesus or are seeking to obtain it can we be said to study his life and teachings aright. Such a study is not an end in itself, it is but a means to the end of attainment of Christ's character. Such reverence for God and his word as he displayed; such purity of heart and life; such unwillingness to think evil of others or to utter it; such abhorrence of pride, selfishness, arrogance and bigotry as he manifested; such strictness of adherence to truth and such belief in its triumph—all these and similar elements he would see in us. Only then have we found the essential, the real Christ, and begun seriously to profit from the study of his life.

MAGAZINES.

The Bachelor is the name chosen for a new 32-page weekly magazine for men, soon to be issued by the Bachelor Publishing Co., Century Building, St. Louis, edited by Mr. W. Reed Carradine. Aside from its literary features, which will be of a high order especial attention will be given to correct dress and fashion for the sterner sex and to all athletic sports. It is to be attractively printed and bound with handsome cover. The subscription price will be $3 a year, or 10 cents a copy.

According to Gen. Joseph Wheeler, the custom of setting apart a day for decorating the soldiers' graves had its origin among the women of his own State of Alabama. Unlike the men, they would not permit their dead "quietly to become a part of general history." Under the title, The Memory of Our Fighting Men, General Wheeler contributes to the Saturday Evening Post of May 27 a strong paper on the history and significance of Memorial Day. Gen. Gobin, of the G. A. R., also treats a similar topic, but from a differing point of view.

Dodd, Mead & Company, New York, have now ready, in the Polychrome Bible, the books of (1) Ezekiel, translated by E. H. Toy, Professor of Hebrew and Oriental Languages and Literature, and Biblical Literature in Harvard University, and (2) Joshua, translated by M. H. Bennett, Professor of Old Testament Languages and History at Hackney and New Colleges, London. Six parts of the Old Testament are therefore ready, the two new parts quoted above and those previously published, viz., (3) Judges, (4) Psalms, (5) Isaiah and (6) Leviticus.

The Treasury of Religious Thought for May, 1899, begins the seventeenth annual volume of this well-established periodical for "Pastor and People." Synopses and extracts of sermons are given by Bishop Fallows, Dr. Talmage, Dr. Burrell, of Brooklyn, and others; and Dr. David Gregg gives a sermon on "Bloom Season," which illustrates May Day as a "Timely Occasion." Practical Christianity is the theme of a fully illustrated article on the work of St. Bartholomew's Church in New York. "Is the Bible an Inspired Book?" is an able article by Rev. Robert Wilson, D. D., of St. John, N. B. The "Names of Note" include this month Dr. Gladden, Gen. O. O. Howard and Rudyard Kipling. The "Movements Among the Churches" are described, as usual, by Prof. Chas. H. Small, of Springfield, O.; Prof. Theo. W. Hunt, of Princeton, has an essay on "Robert Southey;" President Barrows, of Oberlin, has the second part of an article on "A Good Service:" Dr. Hallock, of Rochester, gives the "Prayer-meeting Topics" as usual, and the minor departments, though crowded by the many full and able articles, are well maintained as usual.

"Wonders of the Sky."

I have carefully read "The Wonders of the Sky," by W. J. Russell, issued by the Christian Publishing Co. It is a little work on astronomy, without scientific technicalities. I am delighted with it.

It is entertaining, instructive and enlarging. The appreciative reader will have pleasure in the reading, will have an increase of knowledge and will attain to broader and higher conceptions of the infinite God who made all things.

The Christian Publishing Co. offers to give the book to any subscriber to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST who will pay up his subscription to the end of this year and obtain one new subscriber, thus blessing himself in getting the book and at the same time conferring a great blessing upon another by inducing him to become a reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Professor of Natural Science in Kentucky University.

21 Chapters, 386 Pages, $1.50

This work is a very thorough and scholarly discussion of evolution by one who has had many years' experience as a teacher of science in Kentucky University at Lexington, Ky.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Introduction, Matter, Force, Method of Creation, Spontaneous Generation, Natural Selection, Paleontology, Embryology, Special Objections to the Theory of Evolution, Rudimentary Organs, Secondary Sexual Differences, Instinct, The Origin of Man, A Future Life, Design in Nature, Evil and Altruism in Nature, Agnosticism, Recapitulation, Genesis and Geology, Appendix.

Having been for many years a teacher of various branches of natural science, it has been my duty to discuss the subject of organic evolution. This volume contains some of the objections which I have from time to time presented against the acceptance of that theory, together with several chapters on other subjects.—Author's Preface.

It seems to me that any candid person who reads the book must close it with the conviction that the hypothesis of the origin of organic species by the process of evolution is not only an unproved hypothesis, as its ablest advocates admit, but one that is essentially false. In addition to what the author says on the subject of evolution, he furnishes the unscientific reader with a large amount of information about matter in its various forms and about organized beings that is both interesting and valuable.—J. W. McGarvey, Lexington, Ky.

BOTHWELL.

Died, in Troy, Bradford county, Pa., April 26, 1899, Bro. James L. Bothwell, aged 68 years, four months and 27 days. From young manhood Bro. Bothwell had been a Disciple, and during the long months of his sickness no theme of conversation was of so much interest to him as Zion and her advancement. He leaves a wife and three children to mourn their loss, and a large circle of friends and brethren who feel lonely because of his departure. "Asleep in Jesus."
L. H. BUSH.

HINMAN.

Died, at his home near Tremont, Ill., May 5, 1899, C. W. Hinman. Bro. Hinman was born in Connecticut August 18, 1829, hence lacked only a few months of the allotted three score years and ten. He came West with his father's family in 1845, settling near Groveland, Tazewell County, in which county he has since resided. In 1860, Feb. 29, he was united in marriage with Miss L. C. Vawter, who, although very sick at the time of his death, still survives, with children and grandchildren to mourn his departure. The faithful little band of Disciples of Christ at the Concord Church lose in him an earnest, conscientious and faithful elder, and the whole community one who was helpful in all their fellowships. He had been a Christian for over 40 years, along with his faithful wife, who, with her children, finds comfort in the confidence that he has entered into peace and rest.
R. S. GILCREST.

LANT.

Mary H. Stewart was born March 12, 1850, died May 3, 1899, married to Alexander R. Lant, Oct. 20, 1868. She joined the Methodist Church at the age of 16, and on her removal to Kansas she united with the Bethany Christian Church. She was ready to go, but expressed a desire to remain to see all her children in the church. Funeral services by C. T. Cole and C. C. Deweese. ERRETT ELLIS.

LATIMORE.

Charles Latimore, son of Sister Sarah Krepps, of Farmer City, Illinois, closed his earthly life at 22 years of age. He had been a Christian five years. Though afflicted all his life he did not complain. He was free from evil habits and loved the things that are pure and of good report. He loved his New Testament, which he reverently read. Charlie's quiet patience and unquestioning faith tell us we may meet again where no one ever dies. He has just gone home. E. C. STARK.

McGEE.

Bro. Pearl H. McGee died near Paris, Mo., on the 8 of May, 1899, age 21 years, three months and 18 days. He was the oldest son of Bro. and Sister James McGee, and died after an illness of only 48 hours. Funeral services were conducted at the Pleasant Hill Church in Monroe County by C. H. Strawn and the writer. About five years ago he became a Christian and had always been an exemplary young man. He was quiet, industrious and honorable, being highly respected and esteemed by all who knew him. He had never formed any of the vicious habits so common among young men, but was possessed of much strength of character, and his influence was always in the right direction. In his home he was a model, the idol of a fond mother's heart, the pride and joy of a devoted father and the inseparable companion of a loving brother. To these bereft ones the promises of the Word of God are unspeakably dear, and they are leaning hard upon the "everlasting arm."
W. N. BRINEY.

Paris, Mo., May 11, 1899.

PERKINS.

William Perkins was born in Ganard county, Ky., March 11, 1848, and died at his home near Stanford, April 18, 1899. He was married to Miss Columbia Ann Pepples, Oct. 5, 1876, who with three children and a large circle of friends are left to mourn his loss. In his long and intense sufferings he showed a beautiful Christian patience and fortitude. For 20 years he strove to honor his Savior and passed from among us fully resigned to the will of his Heavenly Father. He is the fifth member of this congregation who has joined the church triumphant since January 1.
FRANK W. ALLEN.

Stanford, Ky.

PRYER.

Charles L. Pryer was born near Newville, Dekalb Co., Ind., Jan. 27, 1841; died at his home in Farmer City, Ill., May 14, 1899. Four brothers had preceded him. Only two sisters remain. Left an orphan at 14 years of age he made his home among strangers. He enlisted when the first call was made for volunteers to defend the country in 1861. Two brothers were killed in battle and he received a wound that was never entirely healed. He was married to Miss Frances Ellen Lowry in 1865. This union was blessed with one son, William, who still lives. Losing his companion in 1879, Bro. Pryer was again married, Dec. 29, 1880, to Miss Romelia A. White, which has been a union of mutual love and happiness. It was under the preaching of Bro. L. L. Carpenter that Bro. Pryer began his Christian life, shortly after the war. His loyalty to Christ has been unwavering and zealous. A vacancy was felt when he was absent from the house of God. A deacon in the church of Farmer City for many years, for his punctuallity, tact, wise counsel and enerjetic service, he will be sadly missed. The Odd Fellows loved and honored him as one of their most exemplary members. May our gracious Father above soften and sanctify the grief of the broken family and help them to walk with an unquestioning faith the path so faithfully followed by the loved one gone before.
E. C. STARK.

SWEENEY.

Died, in Decatur, Ill., in the 40th year of her age, on May 3, 1899, Mrs. Ella L. Sweeney, wife of Bro. Joseph Sweeney. She was a firm believer in our Lord and bore severe suffering in a truly Christian spirit. Funeral May 6 by the writer, assisted by M. Stevenson. A. P. COBB.

Decatur, Ill., May 9, 1899.

Christian S. S. Literature

WHY USE IT?

For the same reason that Christian Churches employ Christian preachers. Preachers are instructors, but not more so than the literature placed in the hands of the children. If first impressions are most lasting, would it not be safer to put sectarian preachers in our pulpits than sectarian literature in our Sunday-schools?

Sunday-school instruction should be in harmony with the teaching of the Bible. The literature published by the Christian Publishing Company is sound to the core, and proclaims the Old Jerusalem Gospel in all its simplicity and purity.

Publishers' Notes.

Are Interesting Books.

In "Aunt Maria's Saturday Talk Series" will be found true stories concerning many of the greatest characters in the history of the world. This series of books has been given the following titles: "Little Presidents," "Little Kings," "Little Queens," "Little Orators," "Little Generals" and "Little Statesmen." Each volume is bound in latest style illuminated cloth, making it attractive to the eyes of the young. The outside will attract the eye of the young, and the inside contains true stories that will benefit the young mind, and that will be an inspiration to the young reader. These books are not made up of trashy stories, but the writer has culled from history true stories concerning men and women who have played well their part in the affairs of the world. These stories should be known by the rising generation of to-day. Parents should have them in their homes where they will delight the children. The price is 50 cents per volume or $2.50 for the set of six volumes, postage paid. Order any one of these series, have it read in your family and you will then want to know the contents of the other five volumes.

SUMMER SUNDAY-SCHOOLS

Are now being organized and will need supplies. The Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo., will send a full set of samples of Sunday-school supplies on receipt of a request. Their Sunday-school literature embraces that which is adapted to all grades and ages from the primary class to the old people in the Bible class. Send for samples and see our supplies before finally deciding on what your school needs. Address Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo.

"KING SAUL,"

By J. Breckenridge Ellis, is a volume in which will be found the author's understanding of the Life of Saul according to the account as found in the Bible. The author of "King Saul" is thorough in Jewish history and leads the mind of the reader into fields of thought not discovered by the ordinary reader of Scripture. The careful reader of "King Saul" will find that the author portrays this historical character in a new and interesting light. The book contains 281 pages and the price is $1.00, postpaid.

"THE SCIENCE AND PEDAGOGY OF ETHICS,"

By H. W. Everest, is rapidly approaching completion. It will be ready to go on the press in a few days. When it is off the press but little time will be required to bind it. The subject will be presented in one volume under the following heads: Theoretical Ethics, Practical Ethics and Pedagogical Ethics.

It will be a book adapted for use by parents, students, teachers and preachers.

MORMONISM OVERTHROWN.

In D. H. Bays' book, "Doctrines and Dogmas of Mormonism Examined and Refuted," the reader will find that the author has answered every strong point of Mormonism. This is a late production and is acknowledged by competent judges to be the most thorough and convincing book against the Mormon doctrine now before the public. Bays demolishes Mormonism gentlemanly and completely. If one has to meet the Mormon elder he should first read Bays' book. It contains 460 pages and the price is $1.50, postpaid.

Stray Notices.

QUEEN ESTHER, hy M. M. Davis, is a timely contrihution to our Old Testament Historical Literature just now when a new interest is heing awakened in the extension of Sunday-school and Endeavor Societies. The sketch is written in a charmlng style, and gives information that can he relied on. Price, 75 cents. Christian Pub. Co., St. Louis.

What We Plead For

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition,
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Senor Emilio Castelar, who died on Thursday of last week was one of the most admirable characters among contemporary European statesmen. As president of the short-lived Spanish Republic, which bridged the gap in 1873 between the abdication of Amodeo and the restoration of the Bourbons in the person of Alphonso XII., he gained reputation, but his powers were not equal to the task of maintaining a Spanish Republic and he resigned after a Presidency of four months. He had been for more than ten years professor of history and philosophy in the University of Madrid; he was a patriot and an orator, admired even by his enemies for the rectitude of his character and the purity of his devotion to the cause of free and republican Spain. But all of this could not bring success to his government in that turbulent time. In later years his republicanism was modified to such a degree that the restored monarchy was not distasteful to him, but he continued to be actively in sympathy with all domestic movements and with the course of events in England and America. Repeated re-election to the Cortes gave him an opportunity to serve his government effectively.

The Sunday newspaper in England has failed. The London Daily Telegraph, after the publication of one or two issues, has abandoned the scheme, declaring that all the churches are against it and that the opposition of the churches would ruin the standing of the paper. It speaks well for the churches that they have so much influence, and well for the publishers that they can appreciate the value of the support of that class of society. But the situation involves other elements than the church. The fact is, public opinion in general, both religious and secular, united in condemning this attempt to break down the barriers which protect the British Sunday. Lord Rosebery is not conspicuously clerical in his sympathies, but he opposed the Sunday paper, and so did a vast multitude of others who attach no value to Sunday as a day of worship. The British people have enjoyed up to the present time one day of almost absolute rest in every seven, and they are not willing to allow a disturbing element to enter. They are willing to wait for the news until the next day. We Americans are a newspaper-reading people, but the popular desire for the news, that is, the desire to be well-informed, is not the only motive to which the Sunday newspaper makes its appeal. We have yet to see the Sunday paper which contained more legitimate news than could be condensed into four of its forty or sixty pages. The eager American will not willingly wait until Monday to learn what happened on Saturday, but he is at least entitled to receive the news without burdening himself with a sensational monstrosity with a gaudily colored supplement. Competition has developed the Sunday paper apparently to the highest degree in the matter of size, sensationalism and glaring bad taste. It is time now for some paper to make a hit by publishing the smallest possible Sunday edition, instead of the largest. The average Sunday paper, by its style and contents, is an insult to its constituency. Unless we are mistaken, there are a good many people in this country who would like to have their newspaper treat them like reasonable beings on Sunday as well as on week days. To put out an object like the typical American Sunday paper is to assume that the public is idiotic and childish. The success of the Sunday paper, as conducted on this plan, lends an unfortunate confirmation to this estimate, but we would like to see this experiment given a fair trial—a Sunday paper giving the news in condensed form and without the sensational features.

The Presbyterian General Assembly has disposed of the McGiffert case in the most simple and sensible manner. After a sharp discussion it was voted to commit the whole matter to the New York Presbytery without instructions. Presumably the New York Presbytery knows Prof. McGiffert, his views and the fruits of his work better than the General Assembly does, and can pass a more intelligent judgment on the case. A minority report to instruct the Presbytery to secure either Prof. McGiffert's retraction of his obnoxious views or his withdrawal from the church was voted down, but at the same time the Assembly was agreed in condemning some of the teaching of the book. As the matter now stands, the book is condemned by the Assembly but the author is handed over to the New York Presbytery without instructions. There is a strong feeling against having another heresy trial and a general hope that Dr. McGiffert will remove the difficulty by either modifying his views (which he is not likely to do since the Assembly has only condemned and not confuted them), or quietly withdrawing from the denomination. The General Assembly next year goes to St. Louis.

There seems to be another and an entirely unexpected hitch in the process of distributing that troublesome $3,000,000 to the Cuban soldiers. Saturday, May 27, was set as the date for the first payment, but only seven privates received their $75 apiece on on that day. The money was ready, the muster rolls were ready, Gen. Gomez was ready, and Gen. Brooke and his numerous assistants were ready, but there was a surprising lack of claimants for the cash. In Havana only seven applicants succeeded in establishing their claims to a share in the bounty, and these had all been servants and had no arms to surrender. Various explanations, more or less unsatisfactory, are offered for the failure of the soldiers to apply for the money. This was only the first day for the payment and the crowd may come later. Comparatively few of those entitled to the money are now in Havana. Intimidation by the anti-American faction is known to have been attempted in some cases and may have been an important factor in the situation. On the surface, the reluctance of the Cubans to receive the money and surrender their arms indicates quite clearly that they are still suspicious of the Americans or are largely under the influence of those leaders who expect to advance their own interests by leading an anti-American agitation. The American authorities in Cuba profess not to be greatly concerned by the apparent failure of the payment scheme, but a satisfactory explanation of the situation has not yet been forthcoming.

Prof. Arthur T. Hadley has been elected president of Yale University, as successor of Dr. Timothy Dwight, who resigned a few months ago. Prof. Hadley is at present professor of Economics at Yale. His election to the presidency marks a revolutionary change in the administration of the affairs of the university and the inauguration of a new policy. The two hundredth anniversary of the institution will be celebrated in 1901, and in all those two centuries the presidents of Yale have without exception been clergymen. Prof. Hadley is a layman. The college was founded primarily with a view to theological education and its administration, molded with reference to that original purpose, has been somewhat freely criticized since the institution has entered fully into the whole field of modern university work. Many have believed that its development and usefulness were hampered by the too great predominance of the clerical element in the administration, and the election of a layman as president and the resignation of the old secretary and treasurer mark the triumph of those who hold this view. It is said that the determining element in the choice of Prof. Hadley was the unanimous and overwhelming demand by the faculty, alumni and undergraduates for his election.

Rosa Bonheur, the French painter, who died recently at an age of over seventy years, has been spoken of as "one of the most remarkable women of the century," and "the most distinguished of women painters." Such praise errs by defect. It is to no purpose to say that she was great among painters of her sex; she was great among painters. Her work, judged on its own merits and without consideration of the sex of the painter, possesses a value which will give her a permanent place in the history of art. She so constantly put her sex in the background, even denying it by assuming masculine attire, which she wore at home to the end of her life, that one is scarcely tempted to commit the error of estimating her by comparison with other women painters. Her best known picture, the Horse Fair, contains no suggestion that its author was a woman, and it challenges comparison with works of its class by any artist of either sex. When Rosa Bonheur adopted painting as a profession, her course was unusual for a woman. But she pursued her own course, conferring not with flesh and blood. So when, in handling the animals, wild and domestic, which it was her chief mission to paint, she felt the need of dress reform, she called no convention and led no agitation, but calmly went her own way, adopted the costume which pleased her best and made no further stir about it. In other words, she assumed the right of women to have a profession and pursue it by all effective means, and she acted on this assumption. She did not stop to talk about it. Without saying that the equal rights agitator has not a legitimate function to perform, it is nevertheless pertinent to approve the policy of this woman who, strong and conscious of her strength, took for granted her rights, stopping not to argue about them, and looked to the outcome of her work for the justification of her course.

The Democratic Presidential campaign for 1900 has been opened and the issue has been stated. The anti-trust dinner, which was held in St. Louis last week, was a gathering of the Democratic leaders and a small army of the rank and file of the party. Mr. Bryan spoke and it is noteworthy that he scarcely mentioned the name of silver. He said that the trusts would be the most important issue in the next campaign and that the Democratic party would be against them. There was no evidence that Bryan's personal prestige with the party had diminished and no one else has yet appeared to dispute his leadership. His declaration in favor of an anti-trust platform does not, of course, mean the abandonment of the silver question. There was a hearty reception for Congressman Champ Clark's assertion that the Chicago platform of '96 must be reaffirmed "sentence by sentence, word by word, syllable by syllable" and that an anti-trust plank and an anti-expansion plank must be added to it. There was evidently a feeling in the minds of those who were the strongest supporters of the Chicago platform, that silver can wait and will have to yield the first place to some other issue if the campaign of 1900 is to have any chance of leading to Democratic success. Of all the speeches made at this dinner, ex-Gov. Altgeld's was the only one which put the currency question in its old place of prominence. This almost unanimous emphasis on the anti-trust plank indicates perhaps not what the leading issue in 1900 really will be, but what the Democratic party would like to have for the issue. The trouble about making this the issue is that in the campaign everybody will be on one side. The fondness of the Republican party for the trusts is a Democratic accusation, not a Republican admission. A Democratic anti-trust plank will not fail to be met by an equally strong Republican declaration on the same side.

Queen Victoria's eightieth birthday was celebrated on May 24, not only in the British possessions, but in many lands where the only obligation was friendship for England and affectionate admiration for her venerable monarch. At Windsor the queen received a serenade and a visit from the boys of Eton College, which is only half a mile from the palace. At London there was an official birthday celebration and many semi-public demonstrations, the effect of the whole being marred only by the perpetuation of the Birthday Ode by the laureate, Alfred Austin. This latter calamity was to have been expected, however, and the public ought to have been prepared for it. The chief part of the official festivities in London was postponed until June 3. The celebrations in other cities were only less numerous and elaborate than those which accompanied the Queen's semi-centennial jubilee, and in all cases they were marked by a cheerful spontaneity which marks them as displays of genuine affection for the octogenarian queen rather than the perfunctory performance of an official duty. There can be no doubt about it—Victoria is loved by her people. And, what is more than that, she is loved by those who are not her people, by the people of many nations and most of all, perhaps, by Americans.

The New York Legislature has met in special session at the call of Gov. Roosevelt to amend the Ford Franchise Tax Bill. As the matter now stands, not only in New York, but in nearly all the states, corporations are assessed for taxation with reference solely to the value of their buildings, machinery and other material equipment. In no case does this represent the total value of the corporation's property as shown accurately and indisputably by the daily stock quotations. If a corporation has 10,000 shares of stock and it is quoted 125, the value of that corporation's possessions is $1,250,000 and upon this sum it should be taxed. If its equipment of all sorts is valued at $750,000, the remaining half million will represent the value of its franchise. At present the corporation pays no tax upon this half milllon. The Ford bill proposes that the value of the franchise, as determined in this way, shall be assessed as real estate. This bill was passed at the regular session of the legislature, but, while it was satisfactory as representing the principle that corporations ought to bear their full share of taxation, it was unsatisfactory as regards the details of the plan by which the taxation of franchises is to be effective. The legislature, meeting in special session almost immediately after its adjournment, adopted the recommendation made by Gov. Roosevelt in his message and amended the bill accordingly. The most important change is to take the work of assessing franchises out of the hands of the local assessors and commit it to the State Board of Tax Commissioners, thus minimizing the influence of local prejudice or favoritism. It is worthy of note that Senator Platt, who has long been considered the friend of corporations, has declared his hearty approval of this new law.

The announcement of the form of government which will be instituted in the Philippines as soon as peace is restored has not been received by the insurgents with any outward show of enthusiasm. The members of the Filipino Peace Commission, who have been conferring with Mr. Schurman and his associates, are not of one mind in regard to the proposed government. Some appear satisfied and others think they can get better terms by holding out longer. Gen. Otis is not in very hearty sympathy with these negotiations, and he has definitely ended the conference which Aguinaldo's emissaries were holding with the American military authorities. This fact has been interpreted as indicating a breach between Otis and Schurman, but there appears to be no reasonable basis for such a report. Gen. Otis' business is not to recognize the Filipino Government by treating with its representatives for peace, but to fight the insurgents until peace has been restored in that portion of our dominions. On the other hand, the business of Mr. Schurman and the Philippine Commission is to investigate conditions, confer with anybody who has any acquaintance with the situation, and make recommendations. It is therefore a part of their duty to find out what the Filipinos want, and there is no better way to gain this information than by conference with their representatives. Any apparent lack of harmony between Gen. Otis and Mr. Schurman can be fully explained by the fact that their work is different and their methods must necessarily be different. Gen. MacArthur still holds San Fernando, and is making it the center for a more complete occupation of the country south and west of that town. There has been no further movement toward the north during the week. There were two sharp engagements in the outskirts of San Fernando last week, in both of which the Filipinos took the initiative. In the first the natives, operating from the trenches which they held a mile north of the town, made an attack upon the town, which resulted in their repulse with a loss of thirty killed and sixty wounded. The trenches were cleared, but were not occupied by American soldiers. A few days later the Filipinos crept back to the trenches and made another unsuccessful attack on San Fernando. It is stated in the press dispatches that there is an obvious need for more troops, since it is now impossible to garrison adequately the towns which are captured. There are now about 25,000 regulars in the Philippines, with over 5,000 more on the way, and it continues to be stated that 100,000 troops will be needed before peace can be established. It is noteworthy that Gen. Otis in his official dispatches makes no request for a large increase of his forces.

It is gratifying to report that the miners' strike at Pana, Ill., which has been attended with more or less disorder for a year past, has at last been amicably settled by a decision of the State Board of Arbitration. While neither side is claiming a victory, it is understood that the rate agreed upon is a slight increase over the previous one.

WORKING AT THE CERTAINTIES.

It is all right and quite necessary to not only tolerate, but foster the spirit of free inquiry concerning the things that are not known. There is a large number of questions which belong to this category. Some of the questions which were once unsettled have been reasonably settled. Concerning others no final conclusions have been reached. It is a matter of some consolation to know that if many of these questions are never settled in this life, the moral order of the universe will not be overthrown nor the salvation of men be imperiled thereby. There is danger at a time like this, when so much is being said about discovering new truths and reaching new conclusions and making new excursions into the realms of the unknown, that we forget to give due attention to the things that are known and to get out of them all that they contain for us.

Progress may be of two kinds. We may progress in the discovery of new truths, and we may progress in the application of old truths to our individual lives and to society. One is progress in knowledge, theoretically considered; the other is progress in life. We need scarcely say that the latter is by far the most important. It would be a great mistake, therefore, if Christians of to-day should be so captivated with the novelty of new theories and discoveries as to turn aside from working along the lines of the great and everlasting certainties which we and our fathers before us received as truth. Intellectual progress is well, but if it is not accompanied with moral and spiritual progress it avails little.

It was known to the Jewish patriarchs, prophets and seers, not only that God is, but that He is a God of righteousness and of holiness. This truth received sublime emphasis from Jesus Christ, who came to make a fuller revelation of the divine character. This is one of the great certainties of our religion and of revelation. It is a vein of truth that has never yet been exhausted. It indicates a line of eternal progress toward moral perfection. If God is righteous and holy, then He is at war with everything that is unrighteous and unholy in this world or in our own hearts and lives. It follows from this sublime and fundamental truth that sin is necessarily destructive, and that the supreme business of every man in this world is to get rid of it. It was for this purpose that Jesus Christ came into the world. His cross is designed to enable men to see their sins and to turn away from them. And this is not a merely initial act in which we come into a new relationship with God; it is a life-long process in which our lives are to grow toward ethical perfection, toward likeness with God. There is not the slightest danger of our making too much progress in this direction.

Christ and His apostles taught that love is the supreme principle in molding character and determining destiny. Love to God and love to fellowmen, Jesus said, was the fulfillment of the law and of the prophets. "God is love," said one who was wont to lean on the bosom of Jesus. Here is a certainty about which there is no dispute. All critics accept it. Whatever else we may have, if we lack love our accomplishments are as nothing. The attainment of this divine quality and the expression of it in our lives offers a vast field for Christian thought and Christian endeavor. We have not begun to exhaust it. We have only begun to realize its vast significance. It is modifying theologies, it is softening denominational asperities and lowering denominational walls, and is beginning to manifest its power in directing our attention to the most needed and neglected portions of society. But the full meaning of the postulate, "God is love," is yet to be apprehended, much more to be manifested in the life of the church.

Closely allied to the certainty that God is love is that other truth that "Christ loved us and gave Himself for us"—the sacrificial death of Christ. Here is a truth we all confess, but how slow we are to recognize its meaning and application! The apostle John, who had a way of striking at the heart of things, saw and stated the significance of the cross when he said: "We ought also to lay down our lives for the brethren." In other words, if we are Christians, we ought to do like our Master, and live not for selfish aims and ambitions, but for the welfare of our kind. The cross, the sacrifical idea, must enter into all our life-plans and purposes, if we are to be Christ's followers. A few here and there accept this idea of life, but as yet the large majority of the church, even, regard what they call "the atonement" as a mere doctrine to be intellectually accepted. It is vastly more important that we come to a truer and worthier consideration of what really constitutes discipleship to Christ, than it is to settle a score of unsettled questions concerning the Pentateuch and other portions of the Bible.

Another one of the great certainties of Christianity is the offer of Christ to communicate His life to men, through faith, and the gift of the Holy Spirit to such as seek Him and open their hearts to Him, who, when He comes into the heart is to enrich it with spiritual blessings and graces and impart fullness of life. How few of us understand the scope and significance of Christ's promise concerning the Holy Spirit and the larger and richer and fuller life which He bestows! Here is a mine of truth richer than the fields of Golconda and sparkling with jewels rich and rare, but we pass it by in search of perishable treasures. Here is room for infinite progress in spiritual power and efficiency. How it challenges our faith and our ambition!

"Beloved," says the saintly John, "now are we children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that if he shall be manifested we shall be like him, for we shall see him even as he is. And every one that hath this hope set on him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." Here is a sublime certainty: when Christ shall be manifested we shall be like him. Glorious truth! Splendid hope! What is its effect? Self-purification, even as Christ is pure.

These are only a few of the great certainties of Christian faith which open up fields to us that have been only partially explored. Let us give more heed to the certainties, and to the duties and obligations which they involve, and we shall be the better able to understand and appreciate the newer truths which may break forth from God's Word in the evolution of the ages.

"THE PROBLEM OF THE NEGRO."

A subscriber takes strong exceptions to some remarks of a recent correspondent in this paper concerning the recent lynchings in the South and the extreme measures resorted to by the infuriated people in connection therewith. We are bound to admit that the correspondent referred to did not take into consideration all the circumstances surrounding these unfortunate events which, while they do not justify, do certainly mitigate the enormity of these acts. It is difficult for one who lives in a remote section of the country, and who is not acquainted with the conditions which prevail in certain regions of the South, to make proper allowance for the extreme measures that are often resorted to in the punishment of these terrible crimes.

The sudden emancipation of the negro race, together with their enfranchisement, has precipitated a condition of things in many parts of the South which is responsible for these appalling crimes and their scarcely less appalling punishment. The great mass of the adult negro population in the South are children in intellectual and moral discipline and in the power of self-restraint, although men in passions and appetites. This, of course, is a dangerous condition of things, and the only permanent remedy for it is in the moral and intellectual culture of these ignorant people. Ex-Governor Northen, of Georgia, in a speech delivered in Tremont Temple, Boston, on Monday evening of this week, discussed "The Problem of the Negro" before the Congregational Club, at its request. After expressing his strong disapproval of lynching and condemning the recent burning as strongly as it could be condemned, he objected, nevertheless, very strongly to the tone of the Northern press in dealing with this affair. On this point he said:

> Now, hear me! What was the policy of the press at the North, with only two exceptions, so far as I know, in the lynching of that villainous fiend, Sam Holt, at Newnan, my state? Great scare heads—"Another negro lynched at the South. Fiendish brutality on the part of the whites toward an unfortunate and defenseless negro. Human devils burn a colored man within fifty miles of the capital of Georgia, and gloat over his tortures like demons. Surely, these people have been remanded to barbarism and become savages in a civilized land." Not one word of sympathy for a pure and virtuous woman; her honor gone; her husband murdered in her presence; she and her little children dragged in the fresh, warm blood of the dying man, and not one word said about this doubly horrible outrage. Surely, in all the North, is there no sympathy except for a negro? No kindly feeling and no tender word for the defenseless women of the South, who carry with them a living shame, in a living death, in a life all too long for its miseries, if it lasts but for a day.

Perhaps there is no lack of sympathy on the part of the Northern people with the women of the South in their brutal abuse by the negroes, but there has been, no doubt, on the part of most papers in the North a lack of appreciation of those conditions which have brought about such acts and which would do the same thing in any state of the Union. What the situation needs is the hearty co-operation of the people of the North and the South in an effort to elevate morally and intellectually the negroes of the South. It is due to Southern people to say that they are in hearty sympathy with efforts looking to this end, and are doing what they can with their limited means to accomplish this work. But it is far too great for them to accomplish alone, and it is no less the duty of the people of the North than of the South to see that the negro is so enlightened and morally trained as to be a safe citizen of the United States.

MONGRELISM IN RELIGION.

He who slaughters an ox, but also slays a man; he who sacrifices a sheep, but also strangles a dog; he who brings an oblation, but also pours out swine's blood; he who burns incense, but also blesses an idol: as these have chosen their own ways, and their soul has pleasure in their abominations, so will I choose troubles that shall harass them, and the things which they dread will I bring on them, because I called and none answered: I spoke and they did not respond, but did that which was evil in mine eyes, and chose, that wherein I had no pleasure (Isa. 66:3, 4).—The Polychrome Bible.

This is a prophecy of the destruction of the Samaritan temple on Mt. Gerrizim, because it stood for an impure and mongrel religion. The Samaritan was the best illustration of mongrelism in both race and religion. He was a half-breed in both respects. He was part Jew and part heathen, so that his religion was Judaism and heathenism mixed in about equal proportions.

When the carrying away of the people into captivity had depopulated the land, the Assyrians deported a colony of their own people to reoccupy and resettle the country. When the Jews were carried to Babylon quite a sprinkling of the population escaped to the mountains and were hence left in the land. This remnant gradually amalgamated with the new Assyrian colonists in blood and faith, and the product of this double amalgamation was the Samaritan, a kind of Palestinian greaser. When the Jews returned from captivity, cured of idolatry and more rigidly exclusive than they had ever been, this degenerate mongrel with a half heathen faith occupying the land of his fathers, became his particular abomination. The Samaritan had the Pentateuch and a Jehovistic religion, but both in a corrupt and heathenized form. He sacrificed a sheep, which was according to the law, but he strangled a dog, which was against the law. He brought an oblation according to Moses, but poured out swine's blood, which was an abomination to Moses. He burns incense, which is acceptable to Jehovah, but blesses an idol, which Jehovah hates. The genuine Jew with the genuine Mosaic religion declines to recognize or fellowship syncretism and mongrelism in either race or religion. Being of pure stock and purged of heathenism in the fiery furnace of captivity, he stands for unmixed blood and pure religion. The prophet strongly intimates that these vicious elements corrupt that which is otherwise acceptable to God. The prophet's attitude to mongrelism in religious faith seems to be that to have a religion half right and half wrong, is as bad as to have one wholly wrong if indeed it is not worse. If you are going to strangle a dog you had better not sacrifice a sheep; if you are going to bring swine's blood to the altar you had better not go through with the form of offering incense; for in addition to the wrong element in your service the argument of inconsistency, if not of hypocrisy, lies against you. It is a question of very grave importance as to how far a mixed life and a mixed religious faith are acceptable to God.

It is the history of all religions that they tend to degeneracy and corruption. Not that in themselves they necessarily have this tendency, but human nature is weak and it is hard to keep men tuned up to a high key for very long at a time. Men will continue to offer sheep, perhaps, that is, to observe the forms of religion, but the first thing you know, and in spite of all efforts to the contrary, they will begin to strangle dogs. If they offer insence they will spoil it by blessing an idol. Few religions have suffered more from mongrelism and the inmixing of foreign ingredients than Christianity. Starting pure at its fountain head, it was soon mingling with the muddy stream of human philosophy, idolatry, heathen forms of worship, superstition, priestcraft and an ethical degradation fatal to its high claims.

According to the Hebrew idea of religion, and that is the idea of revelation, it is a life of conduct and character in right relations to God and man. In its early form it was consecrated to God and the expression of that consecration by separation from the world. To this Christianity added union with God in love that goes out to save the world from sin. According to the Greek, who was the thinker of the ancient world, religion was an idea, a doctrine, a system of thought, and when primitive Christianity came into contact with Hellenism it became an intellectual system, and took the form of a philosophy of the universe. This was the first strangled dog in the history of the church.

Along with the Greek the apostles had a degenerate Judaism to deal with. To the Hebrew element in the church, priest, altar, sacrifice, temple, ritual, and an outward service, stood for religion. What people inherit from the past and see in their surroundings they can not readily get away from. In the minds of recruits from a corrupt and formalistic Judaism it was easy and natural to convert the minister into a priest, the Lord's table into an altar, the sacred emblems of bread and wine into literal flesh and blood to be offered by the priest on the altar, the water of baptism into a magic talisman to regenerate the soul without faith or repentance or the new life, worship into a spectacular exhibition, the church into a visible, external organization, in the pale of which was salvation without either faith or character.

Then came in the Roman idea that strangled dogs and deluged the altar with swine's blood and blessed idols with a vengeance. Rome stood for law, government and the world-powers, the golden text of its Bible was the familiar maxim, "Might makes right." From the standpoint of the Roman idea, religion was a kind of celestial jurisprudence, a forensic legalism, an outward visible order like a political or military organization. This conception externalizes everything in religion and leaves the spiritual and the ethical in nothing except in its weakest and least influential form. It remodeled the doctrines of the gospel on the order of Roman law and reorganized the church after the model of the pagan Roman Empire. The Pope became a spiritual Cæsar and the church a religious Roman Empire, with enough Oriental mysticism and magianism mixed in to give the priest his wonted power over the souls of men. Greekism brought in the strangled dog of metaphysics, Romanism brought in the swine's blood of politics and sacramentalism, and this lifted the floodgate of paganism that blessed the idol of worldliness, and we have a mongrel Christianity in all its glory. An ethical sermon stands in the forefront of the teaching of Jesus, a metaphysical creed stands in the forefront of the Greek, Roman and pagan Christianity of the fourth century.

The two oldest and strongest churches in Christendom to-day are the best examples of the mongrel Samaritanism of the text. The Roman Church is a great institution. Its fundamental creed is evangelical and sound. It has stood like a wall of flint through the centuries for the essential New Testament doctrines of the divinity of our Lord, the fact of the resurrection, the efficacy of the atonement, the personality and work of the Holy Spirit, the inspiration of the Word, the unity of the church and reconciliation to God through Jesus Christ our Lord. It preserved the Bible through the dark ages and was a friend to education when it had no other friend. It has been a great missionary church and has sent out thousands of self-denying missionaries to all the countries of the world. Many of its saints have taken up the cross and have followed the Savior at the cost of their lives, through evil and through good report. It must not be forgotten that Frederick Oberlin, Thomas a' Kempis, St. Francis, of Assissi, the Maid of Orleans and Father Damien were Roman Catholics. In common fairnes, and beyond all question our Romanist friends have slaughtered the ox, sacrificed the sheep, brought an oblation and burnt incense. Is there any room for doubt, on the other hand, that they have slain the man, strangled the dog, poured out swine's blood and blessed the idol? Paganism and Judaism and worldliness have gone hand in hand with Christianity in this religion. What about the idolatries, superstitions and gross abominations of heathenism that have been mixed with the pure elements of Christianity? What about the miraculous power of relics and images, the Holy Coat of Treves, the annual liquifaction of the blood of St. Januarius, the wonder-working power of the bones of saints, and the thousand and one other ridiculous superstitions, along with Mariolatry, sacerdotal priestcraft and papal infallibility? Here is a great mongrelism, a hodgepodge of truth and error, the pure and the impure, the divine and the human, and the question is, Will the truth of this system overbalance and atone for the error, or will the false vitiate and neutralize the true as it did in the mongrelism of the Samaritans? Will God hold a man responsible for the false and the impure and give him no credit for the true and the pure? Must a man be absolutely right in doctrine, worship and life before God will accept him? That is the question to be considered. The principle educed will be applied to Protestantism next week.

What quarrels, fightings, and even murders, are constantly growing out of the drunkard's 'contentions!' Strong drink inflames the passions, and at the same time removes the restraint of conscience and will—it first maddens, and then unchains the tiger.—R. R. Meredith.

Hour of Prayer.

MISSIONARY HEROES.

(2 Cor. 11:24-28; Acts 16:22-34.)

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, June 7th.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: Christianity appeals to the heroic in human nature, and its greatest saints are its greatest heroes.

If it had not been that the religion of Christ does appeal to the heroic in human nature and does call forth the elements of true heroism, it would never have made its way in the world against the opposition that confronted it. The seeds of Christian truth were watered with the blood of Christian martyrs. Its first missionaries faced both pagan and Jewish hostility, and counted no danger too great if by braving it the kingdom of God could be advanced. It would be strange if this were not so, seeing that Christ himself was the most heroic of all souls, and hesitated not to lay down His life for the salvation of the world.

What Christian can read the catalogue of Paul's privations and perils as given in this lesson without feeling that something of the heroic has gone out of our modern Christianity? We are not sacrificing enough. We are not braving enough dangers for Christ's sake. We are not willing enough to endure privations in order to a furtherance of the gospel. In a word, few of us know what it is to enter into "the fellowship of the sufferings of Christ" as did this great missionary of the first century.

The scene presented to us in Acts is that of two foreign missionaries, Paul and Silas, who, because of their testimony for Christ and the works wrought in his name, are dragged into the marketplace before the rulers, beaten with rods and cast into the inner prison with their feet fastened in stocks. But all this did not subdue the spirit of these men of God. At the midnight hour they were praying and singing hymns unto God and had the other prisoners for their audience, when suddenly a great earthquake shook the foundations of the prison and opened all its doors. This resulted in their release and the further preaching of the gospel and the establishment of a church in Philippi. Instead of turning back from their missionary campaign because of its danger, they pressed forward, preaching the gospel, facing mobs, planting churches and sowing the seeds of the gospel abroad in the soil of Europe.

In this way did the Christian Church begin, and in a similar way it has been carried on through the centuries. We would make a great mistake if we were to suppose that all the missionary heroes were confined to the first century. Our own century now closing has had a great number of missionary heroes, among whom are Carey and Judson, Mofiet and Livingstone, and many others. Nor ought we to forget in this Concert of Prayer for Missions our own missionary heroes, some of whom have sacrificed their lives in foreign fields, while others equally faithful are still facing difficulties, bearing burdens and toiling cheerfully on to advance the kingdom of the Messiah in pagan lands. It would be well to call the roll of them at this meeting with as much of their history as can be recalled. Their names deserve to live in the annals of the church and to be cherished in loving remembrance by all of us who love the cause to which they are giving their lives.

But let it be remembered that if Christ's kingdom is to triumph on this earth, the heroism of faith must not be limited to the missionaries, whether in foreign or home fields. We must all have part in it. We may share in that heroism by our sacrifices at home to sustain those in the field, and by seeking opportunities in the spheres where we labor to advance the kingdom of God. By heroic living, heroic praying, heroic giving and heroic working we may enter into fellowship with our missionary heroes and share with them in the triumphs of the Redeemer's kingdom.

As we pray in this monthly Concert of Prayer for our missionaries at home and abroad, let us also pray that we all may be endowed with the missionary spirit, and with the spirit of loyal Christian service, and for a faith that will not be daunted by any obstacles that may stand in our way.

PRAYER.

O Lord, our most merciful Redeemer, we do thank Thee that Thou hast called us into fellowship with Thyself in the great work of saving the world. We thank Thee for the spirit of heroism with which the early missionaries of the cross were endowed, and that Thou hast given the same faith and courage to Thy servants to-day to carry Thy truth and salvation into all lands. We thank Thee for the great army of missionaries now girdling the globe and for all their sacrifices to advance Thy kingdom. Wilt Thou continue to endow them with courage and wisdom and to richly bless their labors to the conversion of many who dwell in the regions of darkness. Do Thou bless those who have gone out from our own homes and churches to plead Thy cause in distant lands and in the destitute portions of our own country. May Thy gracious benediction rest upon them and upon their labors. We pray that Thy whole church may be so filled with Thy Spirit which is the missionary spirit, that it may co-operate more heartily in the great work of evangelizing the world. For Thy name's sake. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

June is here, and the fragrance of roses on the air, the thick foliage on the trees, the rising temperature, the lengthening days, the deep blue heavens flecked with fleecy clouds and a score of other signs proclaim the advent of summer. It is not unwelcome despite the heat which it always brings with it in this latitude. For whatever discomforts it may bring there are compensations. To those who dwell in the cities it gives opportunity for getting out into the country for a breathing spell, to come a little closer in touch with the heart of nature, and recuperating exhausted forces by breathing its pure air, drinking its pure water and feasting the soul upon its scenes of beauty. To those who dwell in the country there is the stimulus of growing crops and grazing herds, outdoor toil relieved by noonday shade, and all the manifestations and forms of life which summer brings to the country. Welcome, June first and most beautiful of our summer months, when, if ever, "there come perfect days."

Already the question, "Where are you going to spend the summer?" is being passed around among the city dwellers, and many minds are busy now planning for the summer outing. It is always more or less a vexed question to those who have no fixed summer plans, for there are many places, each offering its peculiar attractions for those seeking rest and recuperation. Some prefer the mountains with their solitudes and sublimities. Others will go to the seaside where they may hear the thunder of old ocean's billows as they beat upon the shore and disport themselves in its briny waves. Others will be content to locate beside one of our great inland lakes where they may unite the advantages of land and water scenery, while others still will hide themselves away in the wilderness beside some winding stream, where they will pitch their tent and divide their time with the rod and gun. There is a variety of attractions for a variety of tastes, and we are glad that it is so. It is only the man who does not love nature that need be troubled about a summer resort, and even for him there are the fashionable resorts where nature is skillfully concealed.

As our readers know, we favor vacations on general principles. There is too much tension in our American life. We have too few holidays. Life with us is unnecessarily a ceaseless drudgery. It would be better to have a little more of the joy of life as we go along, even if we have less money at its close. There is only one matter which we need to settle as to the vacation when, of course, it is in our power to take it. Can we make it helpful to us in our higher and better nature? May it be made to minister to the needs of the soul as well as of the body? In the long run can we accomplish more work for Christ with the vacation than without it? If these questions can be answered in the affirmative, and our business and duties are of such a nature that we can use the summer vacation, then we ought to do it and do it conscientiously, as we ought to do everything. If God be not in our vacation, then we would better have no vacation.

There are some people who need no special vacation. They have a vacation all the year round. They bear no heavy burdens. They perform no arduous work. "They toil not, neither do they spin." The only real vacation they could take would be to go to work awhile, and they do not hanker after such a vacation. There are others still who are so happily situated that they distribute their vacation along through each month, each week and each day of the year. They are to be envied. The ideal life would be one in which each day could have its hours of toil and of recreation, and if in addition to this ideal arrangement the environment is all right, a summer vacation is unnecessary. Some temperaments do not need a vacation as much as others. So let him that taketh no vacation judge not him that taketh one, and let not him that taketh a vacation judge him that taketh none, but let each one choose his course, knowing that he must give an account to the great Judge for the best use of his time, talents and opportunities.

Reformation of the Nineteenth Century

NINE DECADES OF HISTORY

THE TURBULENT PERIOD.—III.

Civil War and The Christian Churches.

W. T. MOORE.

THE DISCIPLES FIRMLY UNITED.

But be it said to the credit of those who were not swept entirely away from their moorings by the war spirit, that they not only heartily supported the missionary work committed to their hands, but they also maintained with honest integrity their plea for union among all the Disciples of Christ. I desire to emphasize this point very strongly, because recently it has been intimated that the Disciples were practically divided during the war, although no formal division actually took place. This view of the matter is entirely erroneous. Doubtless there were alienations, certainly sometimes bitter feelings, but in no case can it be truthfully said that anything like a division was ever seriously contemplated by brethren on either side of the conflict. There was never at any time the slightest possibility of a real division among the Disciples, no matter how the war might have terminated. Indeed, most of the Disciples, both North and South, bitterly lamented the fratricidal strife. Many of them were opposed to war in any of its forms, and this view had received special emphasis in the teaching of Mr. Campbell. One of his great deliverances was published in 1848, at the close of the Mexican war, and was a ringing protest against war as a means of settling national or international difficulties. Hence it may be stated truthfully that the Disciples, as a religious body, had been educated to look upon war as an untold evil; and, consequently, while most of them were loyal to the Federal Union, there were not a few who preferred even secession rather than an appeal to the arbitrament of the sword. This states the exact facts of the case, and it is due to the truth of history that no concealment should be made at this point.

Of course, it is freely admitted that some of the noblest and truest men in the ranks of the Disciples held to a different view. These believed it to be their religious duty to take up arms to defend the government against what was believed to be an unreasonable rebellion. Nevertheless, these never lost sight of the fact that they were fighting against an illegal combination of men that managed to draw within their plans many thousands, and among these many brethren who had really no heart in the disunion movement. Whether or not this view of the matter was entirely justified by the facts of the case need not be discussed here. It is undoubtedly true that it was from this standpoint that those Disciples who became defenders of the national flag justified their conduct.

Furthermore, it cannot be denied that, when the conflict was over, the Southern brethren were immediately received into the fellowship of the loyal churches without any reference to the question of the war.

EMANCIPATION OF THE SLAVES.

The war in itself was not the only thing that strained the relations between the Christians of the North and South. At the beginning of the war there was perhaps little or no thought, upon the part of the Unionists, that slavery would be disturbed. The Republican party had disavowed the intention of interfering with slavery where it already existed; their contention being that they proposed to keep it out of the territories, so that no more slave states could be admitted to the Union.

Many of the Southern people accepted this declared policy in good faith, and during the first year of the war, Mr. Lincoln seemed strongly inclined to carry out this policy according to the strictest letter of the law. However, it became increasingly evident, as months went on, that slavery was doomed. The Northern people were quite willing to let slavery alone where it existed while there was no war, but after the war had been inaugurated, public sentiment in the North began to change, until it became overwhelmingly in favor of freeing the negroes as a war measure, if for no other reason.

For a time Mr. Lincoln seemed to hesitate; but at last, on the 22nd of September, 1862, only a few days after the battle of Antietam, he issued his famous proclamation, declaring that on the following New Year's day, in all the states that had not returned to their allegiance, the slaves should be thenceforth and forever free. This did not at once affect the loyal border slave states; but every one could see that the proclamation was practically equivalent to the ultimate extinction of slavery throughout the whole South, if the Union cause should ultimately prevail.

This proclamation had the effect to practically unite the South; so after this the people of the South claimed that they were fighting for their property as well as their political rights.

RANKS OF THE DISCIPLES STILL UNBROKEN.

But even this additional strain did not break the fellowship between the Disciples of the two sections. Doubtless the extremists on both sides were driven farther apart by this act of President Lincoln, but it is equally certain that the thoughtful Christians of both parties did not fail to see in the proclamation the hand of Providence, and consequently it had a softening influence upon many rather than the opposite effect.

Many years before the war Mr. Campbell had predicted the very state of things which had now come to pass; consequently, while he counseled moderation on the part of all, he was thoroughly convinced that the two sections of the country could not live in peace together with slavery between them as a constantly disturbing cause. This view was shared by many of the most eminent Disciples of that day, and doubtless this earnest conviction had its due weight in determining the final course of the churches with respect to the preservation of the Union among themselves.

While, therefore, the anti-slavery proclamation did much to unite the South in support of what had come to be regarded as a common cause, there was, nevertheless, a deep-seated feeling among the Christians of the South that no war in defense of slavery could ever be permanently successful. This element in the conviction of Southern Christians evidently had much to do in helping them to bear what would otherwise have been an intolerable load. It was this that enabled them to forgive and forget, when the war clouds had passed, for it is well known that those who fought with the greatest bravery and those who suffered most have been, since the war, the most thoroughly reconciled to to what was the final issue. Only those who stopped at home have kept up the spirit of the rebellion since the war came to an end.

But, however this may have been, there was no division. This statement can be sustained by the most overwhelming testimony. The following extract is from an article in Lard's Quarterly for 1866, written by the editor on the question, "Can We Divide?" After referreng to several local efforts by certain men to cause division, Mr. Lard says:

"Not only have these men been able to produce no division among us, nor in any other way hurtfully to affect us, save by ruining themselves and a few other individuals; but causes far more powerful than they have been successfully withstood. From the moment of our denominational origin in this country up to the very present, we have had the exciting and dangerous question of slavery to encounter. Our brethren South stood strongly for, our brethren North strongly against the institution. Never for a moment did it cease to chafe and fret. At times it certainly became threatening and wore an ugly look. Brethren on both sides would occasionally flame high and talk loud. Still, all through the strife it excited, all through the passion it aroused, we lived without even the semblance of a breach. Other bodies it divided; ours it could not. And if slavery proved inadequate, we may with much composure question the adequacy of other causes. And now the angry topic is laid asideforever. Brethren who opposed it courteously decline to exult: brethren who favored it magnanimously decline to complain. It is settled forever. It has spent its force, and still the children of God are one. As a nation we can never be reproached with it more: as Christians it can never again make us fear. For these results let us be thankful.

"But further, we as a nation and as Christians have just passed the fierce ordeal of a terrible war, a war in which passion ran to its height and feelings became as ferocious as feelings ever get. We had many brethren on both the opposing sides. Many of our churches stood precisely where the carnival raged most. Yet not a rent in our ranks did the war produce. True, for the time being it cooled many an ardent feeling, and caused old friends to regard one another a little shyly. Still, it effected no division. And now even those kindly feelings are obviously beginning to flow back, and brethren from the two hostile sides are meeting as brethren should ever meet. They even seem to vie with each other in acts of magnanimity and high Christian bearing. The war is never mentioned but in accents of sorrow; crimination and recrimination are never heard; the cause of Christ is the constant topic of conversation; while all noble hearts are beating high with joy that our unity is left to us perfect. If, now, we have triumphantly come through this storm, and still gloriously stand an undivided people, have we not reason to count with confidence on the future? May we not boldly say, trusting in God to help us, We can never divide?"

THE LEADERSHIP OF THE CHILD.

ROBT. T. MATHEWS.

And a little child shall lead them.—Isa. 11:16.

There could not have been a more vivid picture of the triumph of the gospel. The prophet sings of the time when "the wolf shall dwell with the lamb," and "the leopard shall lie down with the kid;" he sees "the calf and the young lion," "the cow and the bear," feeding together, and in the forefront, the real glow of the scene, "a little child" leading them. The prophetic vision means, in plain language, the victory of moral forces over passion and violence. Blind instincts, raging appetites, warring desires have quieted down under the influence of truth and love; while human life henceforth has its hope, its unique hope, of progress in the childlike spirit.

Thus in Isaiah's prophecy is a wonderful commingling of figure and fact. Only time can tell the power of man over nature and the lower animals; his dominance there already has its signal proofs. And this subjection of the mighty forces of earth and air, taming of beast and serpent, is but the augury of his final control of the brutal elements of human life, and of the universal sway of peace and harmony in human society. Of course, the central secret of this triumph of the gospel is the leadership of the child. If the child shows the man as the morning shows the day, if the potencies of the man's talents and character are germinal in the child, then if the child can only live at its best and grow normally, it is resonable enough to believe the prophet's word that in all true, healthy progress of the kingdom of God, a "little child shall lead them."

That particular leadership is already today making itself felt may well claim our study awhile.

There is much pathos in the fact that it was a long, long time before any leadership of the child distinctively was at all recognized. The notices of childhood in human annals up to the present age are only in hints and gleams, never a large, steady glow of light. How we treasure the few bright passages of literature that shine with the life of the little child! The valiant Hector hurries from the battlefield awhile to visit his wife and baby-boy; and as the little one shrinks back—the mighty warrior hastily took the helmet from his brow and kisses his only child and tosses him up in play, and with the certainty of grim death ahead he prays:

"scared to see
His father helmeted in glittering brass,"

"May they say,
'This man is greater than his father was.'"

The boy Cyrus bands his little fellows together and marches at the head along the village street—the young captain who became the renowned king of war and conquest. In Horace's graceful lines we catch sight of the Roman schoolboys on their way to school with their books slung over their shoulders, and the tuition money in their hands. Or, the Bible reveals the healthy-minded and healthy-hearted child Samuel in lowly duty and task learning how to judge Israel, and the coy maiden blushingly giving her counsel for the good of the king, and the troop of children in the marketplace playing now a wedding, now a funeral, and the little faces awed and wondering as the great apostle knelt with the fathers and mothers on the seashore in a farewell prayer.

Not many such pictures do we see in all ancient literature, nor but little increase in later records down to our own day. But now it is far otherwise. Children are indeed in the forefront. They make a widespread interest in themselves as a class. They are becoming the focus of profound study by philosophers. They evoke the special care of legislators. They are the object of new methods of educators. Most significantly of all, they are silently, and unconsciously to themselves, renewing and remolding the mind of theology. It all results because this is the age of individual rights—the value of the individual soul in the sight of God, the individual man, the individual woman, and necessarily the individual child. Down, down, to the last, the right of the individual necessarily had its way—where life begins, whence life unfolds, where "the child is father to the man." It took the human race, the best part of the human race, nearly two thousand years, under the gospel, to learn this lesson; and it is not in the Old World under monarchy, but in the New World under democracy, in our own American Republic, in a government "of the people, by the people, for the people," where the individual man thus far in history has his best opportunity, that the lesson of the rights of children has been most fully set us with all of its privileges and perils.

We could not want a better instance of of the noble privilege of childhood than is found in the kindergarten. Right on the face of the facts, here is the very opposite of the old-time estimates and methods in teaching and training children. In this new light the child is not to be repressed and suppressed. There is no place for kicking and cuffing a flowerlike boy or scolding and growling at some overflow of animal spirits, or calming into silent dread the ebullient mind of youth. Nay, we parents can but confess that our difficulty often, amid other cares and distractions of the household, is to find the time, to take the time, for quietly and gently correcting a naughty child. We acknowledge here the apostolic ideal, "Provoke not your children to wrath, that they be not discouraged." This is not to deny the need sometimes of the Spartan element in rearing children, the call for Solomon's rod in chastening a rebellious spirit. Nor let us blindly overrate the kindergarten, failing to see its own limitations and especially that it takes its little pupils under the most favorable environments where many exigencies and obstacles of domestic and social life are happily excluded. But what it does stand for in the privilege of child-life to-day, let us gratefully appreciate. The kindergarten means,not repression, but direction; not suppression, but development. It means that the child shall be interested, drawn out, amused, occupied, employed. In play that is work and in work that is play, while the eye sparkles, or the hand is busy, or the feet skip and run, the little mind itself is delicately unfolding in varied knowledge of objects and forms and colors, and the little imagination is brightening with the sense of beauty, and the little conscience is learning easy lessons of morals and manners, and the little heart is opening in sweet obedience to the teacher's will and the little spirit is bowing in worship before the God and Father of all.

Nor could we have a more solemn proof of the terrible peril of childhood than in the increasing number of places and kinds of legalized evil. That is the masterpiece of Satan in this age—to induce legislators to license the evil which, it is averred, cannot be outlawed. The dire consequences are fast multiplying under the eyes of us all. To-day, in the new childhood of the age, in the expansion of individual rights, in large liberty of both life and circumstance into which the child is born, children have the freedom of the streets where they both see and hear both good and bad, and are rapidly familiarized with both morality and immorality, and are subjected to the severest tests of purity or vice. In nearly all of our large cities, throughout their areas, the steps of the child cannot be estopped from going out where the sights and sounds of evil assail him daily, and all because his very environment in a thick population is part and parcel of civil liberty to which he is heir. Another prophet foresaw in the restored Jerusalem, the holy mountain, the streets of the city full of boys and girls at play. The direful fact for us Americans to ponder, in view of the freedom of our children, is their peril amid so much organized, so much legalized deviltry on square after square and street after street, where they must breathe and frolic.

The status of childhood to-day—privileges on the one hand, perils on the other—from every point of view is best described in the prophet's note of leadership. Because children are now so much in evidence, because we must see them, hear them, do for them on the large scale, as a class of human beings, we may learn from the seer's vision both duty and hope: "And a little child shall lead them." As we heed Froebel's exhortation, "Come, let us live for the children," it will be easy enough to mark how all the time they are leading us. We teach them, but we learn from them more than we teach. We train them, but rather at the very time we are training ourselves. Ever, ever, as we live for them and live with them, under the full light of the gospel of Christ, the children are leading us.

The prime concern of this childlike leadership is whether, as the years go by, we are keeping the childlike spirit. The Lord Christ's own word here is incisive: "Except ye become as little children, ye shall in nowise enter into the kingdom of heaven." His great apostle who exhorts, "Be not children in mind, but in mind be men," yet balances his doctrine, "Howbeit, in malice be ye babes." The childlike spirit—to grow in this spirit unceasingly, to be harmless, simple, trustful, docile, hopeful, even in the tried intelligence of manhood, is ever the high ideal of the perfect character. The childlike spirit is a greater thing than Solomonic wisdom. We can remain childlike only as we live with children and live for them. They will keep us young and fresh, if we willingly devote ourselves to their welfare. We are on the way to a morose, loveless old age when we turn away from the little ones and have neither time nor taste for their company. Let it be our good that they are leading us, keeping us, in the freeness and freshness of human life.

It is a highly significant fact how we are led by children as they learn from us the primary truths of religion. They simply cannot be taught Atheism. The negations of infidelity can find no retaining point in a child's mind. The child naturally learns positive truth or nothing at all, so far as Theism is concerned. You can let the child alone, withholding all knowledge of the one true God, as was the case with John Stuart Mill, under the severe tutelage of his stoical father; and then time brings its revenge of some desperate travail of soul in its hunger for its Maker. But the human soul is made by God for himself, and it is not chance nor fashion when a child, learning early of God, learns this idea so easily, its little mind opening so naturally and beautifully to the great mystery of infinite and eteral Being,

"And by the vision splendid
Is on his way attended."

We may study and think on the primal truths of God and duty and immortality, and we may rightly aspire in knowledge to be men; but evermore the little child leads us in his simple faith and awe before the idea of Deity, in his quick conscience of right and wrong, and brings us back from our obstinate questionings to—

"Those first affections,
Those shadowy recollections,
Which, be they what they may,
Are yet the fountain light of all our day,
Are yet a master light of all our seeing."

Assuredly we parents can testify that our children are leading us significantly as we endeavor to inculcate in them the great principle of obedience to authority and law. There stand the two precepts of the family, "Children obey your parents in the Lord;" and to us fathers and mothers concerning the children, "Nurture them in the chastening and admonition of the Lord." "In the Lord"—"of the Lord"—how slow of heart have we all been to believe all the meaning of these luminous phrases, blinded by our theological prejudices and theories! It is what the Lord himself is to the children that will lead us, in the circle of the home, to learn fully the truth and power of the gospel. Already a child's obedience to the simplest rule of father and mother is in fellowship with the Lord, and our every discipline of the child is to have in it the light and power of the Lord. So do the children lead us to a deeper and wider, a more vital grasp of the privilege and operation of redemption. So do they lead us to feel more keenly our own faults and failures as examples in their eyes. So do they lead us to pray for patience, the humble, kindly, self-sacrificing spirit in teaching and training them. So do they lead us to understand that already, in our discipline of them and their disobedience to us in the Lord, is the germ of the regenerate life, which will bud and bloom silently and without noise, no strain, no agony, as God graciously leads them in the sweet mystery of the Spirit and their own simple-hearted willingness to confess the good confession and be baptized.

It is no small example of children leading us—their annual celebration of world-wide missions. How much Children's Day means for the present; how much it augurs for the future! The children are learning what great things the gospel is accomplishing in far-off lands. They are becoming familiar with countries, customs, faces, names, needs, in childlike enthusiasm. Their little hearts are expanding in fresh sympathies with their little fellows of every climb and nation. They are learning the wealth of missionary Scriptures, and the music of missionary songs, and the meaning of missionary speeches, and the joy of missionary giving. Who can tell all the good to come to the Church of Christ from this growth of a generation of children in missionary interest and missionary contributions! They rebuke us adults for our ignorance on the subject of missions. They shame us for our worldliness and covetousness in the day of missionary offerings. By the fresh and joyous spirit of the children in celebrating world-wide missions God is teaching his church, inviting his church, leading his church to this illimitable fellowship in the progress of the gospel.

"LAST OF ALL."

JASPER SEASTON HUGHES.

"He was seen by Cephas, then of the twelve. After that he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once, of whom the greater part remain to this present, but some are fallen asleep; after that he was seen of James, then of all the apostles; and, last of all, he was seen of me also, as one born out of due time." If these words were written about the year 60 A. D., then Paul was not the last to see Christ by a period of thirty-five or thirty-six years. About a quarter of a century after Paul and Cephas had closed their testimony by martyrdom, and perhaps very few if any of the five hundred brethren survived, the "bosom disciple" might have written the same words, "And last of all he was seen of me also, as one retained for a special purpose, a long time after," of whom Christ said to Cephas, "What is it to thee if he tarry till I come?"

Paul regarded his call and new birth and mission as belated. But primacy merely in time, which held so high esteem at first that Peter declared that in choosing one to take the place made vacant by Judas he must be "some one who has companied with us from the baptism of John," is proven by Paul's commission not to be essential to apostleship, though it must still have held a prominent place in the mind of the church. It must have been used then for all it was worth against Paul's apostleship by his enemies.

His language pays a sort of apologetic reference to this traditional sentiment among the brethren. It shows the effects of Peter's address at the election of Matthias, who left no record commensurate with the estimated importance of his election, while Paul, who had not this very important qualification of having journeyed with the disciples from the time of John's baptism, filled the very world by his vast activities.

This contains a lesson we might learn to our own profit about placing an undue estimate on the circumstances of the earlier disciples' opinion on some things. It shows us in the first place how much larger place Paul made for the believers in Christ to stand. This became apparent when Peter went up to Antioch and was not able to entirely behave himself before Paul's congregation. How little it availed the noble Paul when he returned the visit and submitted to the advice of the brethren at Jerusalem to take the old vow and the disfiguration of a shave according to the law!

But a still wider lesson is to be seen inthe fragmentary character of the Acts of the Apostles by Luke. It is true, he mentions all the apostles by name and gives Peter the primacy at the beginning, being chief speaker and leader at the election of Matthias and at the Jerusalem Pentecost and at the Gentile Pentecost, at the house of Cornelius, and a few words about John and James and then everything seems to encircle about Paul to the end. Had some one taken up Luke's work and continued to write to the close of the century, we should have a different result. Then we should have seen Peter as the great leader at the beginning, Paul the great leader in the middle and John the great leader at the close of the century; and we should see the church taking on their characteristic differences of conception of Christ and the kingdom.

Peter, tenacious of priority as a condition of apostleship, and of the law and traditional ceremony, and who could also wield a sword in an emergency, had a form most easily perverted into a worldly acceptance, and the world accepted it thus, and claimed a succession of Peter's chairs in the proud pontiffs of Rome, where the great dome of St. Peter still stands for legalism gone to seed. Paul, champion of liberty and of faith, had a harder task, a battle against national prejudice, and his cause had to sleep till the light of the sixteenth century brought him again into the world as from the dead and made him father of the Reformation.

The Reformation has continued his cry of faith against legalism and has renewed and continued the battle for liberty of conscience, and has been followed by persecution from the false claimants of Petrine succession at the Vatican. John, who was never known to have any part in the strifes about the law or other controversies, the serenest, the most intellectual, the most lovable and soul-loving, is yet to be heard, and his voice will pacify the nations and establish the dominion of love in all the kingdoms of men.

The Reformation has so mightily emphasized liberty and faith as in effect to tolerate vice and atheism, and our society holds equally at bay those who attack it and those who defend it. But between light and darkness John sets an impassable gulf. Protestantism is the reverse side of Romanism. Van Dyke says: "One reason of this one-sidedness lies in the fact that we have hitherto been looking almost entirely to the first three Gospels as the source of our knowledge of the kingdom of heaven, but the fourth Gospel, if indeed it be, as the best modern scholars say it is, the most faithful image and memorial of Jesus that any man could produce, must be no less important in the light which it throws upon this controlling idea of his mind."

But if this be true of the Gospel of John, how abundantly more of the Revelation which God gave to Christ to be written in a book and sent to the churches! The contrast is very great, for in his Gospel John places himself on a plane with the others as to his authorship and purpose, but in the Revelation he represents himself as passive and instrumental, and as writing and doing what he is told.

If John's Gospel was written long after the death of Cephas and of Paul, it certainly shows a riper and richer view of Christ and of the church, and a more enlightened view of Christ's inward and true meaning. But I also affirm that the Apocalypse contains the fullest and mightiest revelation of God. It completes the Acts of the Apostles. It reveals the ages future and the full view of the church becoming the kingdom of God and of his Christ. John's writings taken together present Christ in a higher light than the Reformation has yet reached.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

THEOLOGICAL HYSTERICS.

W. J. BURNER.

An excellent brother recently committed to print the opinion that the Higher Criticism is "nonsense," that "liberality" is a snare and a delusion, and that a paper which dares to call these two spirits of evil from the vasty deep should not be supported by our people, who should confine their reading to a paper published at Louisville, Ky., and one like unto it which sends forth from Cincinnati its "salutiferous and vivifying rays." The brother is one of a considerable number who are just now afraid of something. They may wake up some morning and find that the Christian Church has been secretly deprived of its faith in the Word of God. Preternatural suspicion, chronic distrust and a disposition to become panic-stricken drive sleep from their eyelids and people the night with terrible shapes. They are scared. They are proud of it, and they want everybody to know it. They have deep doubts and loud condemnations for any one who is not as good as they are in "seeing things at night."

This hyterical disposition should not be taken too seriously. Nevertheless, it might not be out of place to suggest that the Christian Church now numbers about twelve hundred thousand members, who are fairly intelligent and are generally able to give good reasons for the faith that is in them. From a theological standpoint they are pretty firmly established. The body is so big and so firmly grounded that it can look calmly and serenely at the problems which the Higher Criticism propounds. Fear is beneath our dignity as a religious body.

Furthermore, if the conservatives read only conservative papers, and the progressives read only paogressive papers, those whom God joined together would be put asunder. The history of sects exhibits on every page the unspeakable folly of this way of settling questions. In place of two parties in one body we would have two bodies. Then in the course of human events each new body would evolve exactly the same kind of parties, and so on ad finitum. "Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness," said one of our pioneers, "but with controversy, brethren, the mystery disappears and the truth of the matter is apparent to all." A paper that is one-sided is soon lop-sided. Ingersoll said of the Andover professors that each one was required to solemnly affirm that during his tenure of office he would not intellectually advance. Do we need editors of this petrified type?

Sometime it will dawn on the minds of the terrified that the traditional theory of the inspiration of the Bible is not a part of our creed. "No man will be saved by the belief of a theory, true or false," said Alexander Campbell; "no man will be damned for the disbelief of any theory." Do these dear but troubled souls believe this? If they do, why this hideous noise? If they don't, why these constant charges that other folks have departed from the original platform? Would they reverse our glorious history, concede that belief in Jesus Christ is an insufficient doctrinal test, push the sun back through the gates of the morning and labor in the darkness at the old, bad business of creed-making, merely because they are afraid that men who believe in Jesus Christ will lead the church into something directly contrary to belief in Jesus Christ?

Irvington, Ind.

THE DASH OF SAM DASH.

J. W. McGARVEY.

I have read with care the article in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of May 18, under the heading, "The Christian Standard and the Life and Teaching of Jesus." By correct application of the principles of Higher Criticism I conclude that the document is pseudonymous; and as the author is probably still alive, I venture to remind him that it is not considered courteous to criticise brethren by name over a fictitious signature.

If this pseudonymous production had been published in the Christian Standard, whose readers are familiar with what I have written under the head of Biblical Criticism, I would scarcely have written a notice of it; but as it has been printed in a paper the chief part of whose readers never see my articles, and as it contains not a single quotation from the articles which it condemns, proper respect for the favorable opinions of brethren whom it may influence demands of me a few words of defense.

Sam Dash says that my writing on criticism "is as feeble as it is forcible." Perhaps it is. I hope he knows what he means. And he adds: "Its usual trend appearing to look toward mere traditionalism at any cost, at the expense of culture and those higher and deeper and broader meanings of things which are not always manifest on the surface, and at the price of the reputation of brethren in Christ whose Christian faith and character are beyond reproach."

Now here is a series of charges that are very serious when we consider that they are made about writings unknown to the readers, and are admitted to the columns of a reputable religious journal. To represent me as "looking toward mere traditionalism at any cost," is to deny that I have ordinary intelligence. It is also very far from the truth; for I receive nothing as true, whether in criticism or any other department of knowledge, on mere tradition. Especially have I taken no position on questions of biblical criticism without careful study of the evidence and arguments on both sides. When I write on these questions I know what I am about.

This charge is intensified when my accuser specifies the "cost" at which I am said to be holding to traditionalism. This cost consists of two items: first, "at the expense of culture and those higher and deeper and broader meanings of things which are not always manifest on the surface;" and second, "at the price of the reputation of brethren in Christ whose Christian faith and character are beyond reproach."

As to this first item of cost, I have flattered myself that I had acquired some little culture as a result of a long life devoted to diligent study and to association with cultivated persons, and I am not conscious of having cast any of it away. And as to the "higher and deeper and broader meanings of things," they are the very things which I have been most earnestly searching for since in early life I learned the lower and shallower and narrower meanings with which some men remain contented. Indeed, the kind of criticism against which I have written most frequently is obnoxious to me because it is content with assigning low, shallow and narrow meanings to sacred things. It skims along the surface where infidelity has played its part, and refuses to see the "deep things of God."

As to the second item of cost, I deny indignantly that I have impaired the reputation of any brother in Christ, any farther than to copy what he himself has published and to criticise, not him, but his utterances. If any brother's reputation has suffered at my hands it has suffered in consequence of positions which he has held and argued, and not in consequence of any detraction on my part. If Sam Dash can prove the contrary I shall be ready to make the amende honorable. Of one thing I am quite certain: I have never dealt with a brother as Sam Dash now deals with me; I have never published in a newspaper a representation of a brother's writings calculated to impair his good repute without quoting fairly what he has written, so that my readers may judge whether I am doing him justice.

Another complaint against my writing on criticism is expressed in these words: "Much that is poetry he would turn to prose, and much that is fiction he would construe into indisputable fact, whilst there is no need for such change, especially when the price comes so high."

If he had said: "Much that I think is poetry he would turn to prose, and much that I think is fiction he would construe into indisputable fact," I might let this pass as a mere difference in exegesis between me and Sam Dash. This might be disastrous to my reputation as an exegete, but that depends on who Sam Dash is. From the oracular way in which he speaks, he may be greatly my superior in exegetical skill; perhaps he is, but no matter how much superior, he ought not to charge me thus before strangers without some specifications copied from what I have written.

Finally, Sam Dash belittles the questions that I discuss, and insinuates that I make a man's position on them a test of fellowship. He says: "These questions, only in a very superficial sense, do not affect the faith, the truth as it is in Jesus; they belong to the realm of opinion and speculation and there should abide, and should not be made tests of a man's soundness or bonds of fellowship." Here it is not expressly asserted that I have made these questions tests of fellowship, but the words employed would make the impression on strangers that I have. Sam Dash ought to have expressed himself differently. Undoubtedly some of the positions I have combated ought to be tests of fellowship, for they are essentially infidel; but I do not remember to have found any brother in Christ upholding these. As to the rest, when Sam Dash says that they affect the faith "only in a superficial sense," he admits enough to justify me in trying to show the truth about them; for everything that affects the faith injuriously, even in a "superficial sense" is worthy of serious opposition in this age of skepticism. But in my own judgment, the critical views which I habitually combat in the Christian Standard are all directly or indirectly antagonistic to the faith, and when Sam Dash says that they are only superficially so, this is another instance of difference in judgment between Sam Dash and J. W. McGarvey. If Sam Dash had only signed his real name, perhaps the brethren could have seen at once that he must be right and McGarvey wrong. He knows not how much he may have lost by signing himself Sam Dash. He has spoken kindly of me, for which I am thankful; I would have been more so had he represented my teaching correctly.

Our Budget.

—Children to the front next Lord's day!

—What an army of young people that will be!

—In that army are the captains and generals who are to guide our forces in the future.

—What a sight it would be to look down from above next Lord's day upon the processions of children marching to the churches with their offerings for Christ!

—What music it would be if the ear was acute enough in hearing to catch the united strains of their voices as they sing the praises of Jesus in whose name and for whose sake they gather!

—Not only will Children's Day be helpful to the children themselves, but it cannot fail to exert a most salutary influence upon the church itself, quickening its faith and renewing its religious zeal. We are seeing the fulfillment of the prophet's vision, "And a little child shall lead them."

—By the way, do not fail to read the articles by Bro. Mathews on the text above quoted, found in this issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It is a little lengthy, but you will not think it too long if you read it carefully. It is appropriate to the season.

—Echoes from our Congress continue to come in from the religious press. The St. Louis correspondent of the Cumberland Presbyterian says: "Some of the papers read were not only practical, but masterly in their grasp of the questions handled. Though the discussions were often animated, even exciting, I do not think I ever saw a more fraternal spirit manifested." That is the way the Congress impressed our religious neighbors.

—The same correspondent adds: "Two of the papers upon the Holy Spirit were among the strongest I ever heard or read, and would have been applauded in any Cumberland Presbyterian assembly. For one I rejoice in the growing liberality and spirituality of this vigorous young church, and I enjoyed the Congress exceedingly."

—One of the dailies of this city expressed its surprise at the perfect freedom of thought which was manifest in the Congress and doubted if it had ever been equaled in any meeting of the kind ever held. We are glad that others recognize this freedom in Christ which we enjoy, but we should like for them to know also that no other spirit would be consistent with our religious position. Faith with us means faith in the divine Christ, and loyalty to Him is the only test of that faith. With this position liberality of opinion is the logical corollary. True, there have been always among us a few who have not recognized this fact, but the great majority of the body have always done so. No religious body on earth offers a freer and broader platform of Christian fellowship and of Christian thinking.

—Mrs. U. S. Higdon and Mrs. J. Frymire, of Higdon, Madison County, Mo., have written to the editor a letter in which they say: "Down here in Madison County, at Higdon, is a Christian Church, Higdon Chapel, that is struggling hard to progress. We are building a parsonage, which is quite an undertaking for a church of such small means, but the building is going on nicely. Our little Sunday-school wants to observe Children's Day for Foreign Missions, and the young people have been very anxious to get an organ; so they have raised $12, and it seems impossible to raise another cent. We are a poor country church, but are doing the very best that we can. Do you know of a small second-hand organ that we could get for that price?" We do not know of such an one, but we hope there is some church or Sunday-school that has bought a new organ and has an old one that they could either sell for that price or donate to this young struggling country church that wants to observe Children's Day and keep up the missionary spirit. Who will help these sisters? Address them directly or at this office.

—Referring to our statement in a previous number, that the editorial representative of the Register-Review seemed to have been the only one present in the Congress who was able to detect a "strong Unitarian tendency," that paper observes that the editor of this paper must be under the influence of this same Unitarian tendency not to have detected the same in the late Congress. If our readers, therefore, have failed to detect any Unitarian tendency in our writings, according to this theory they must suspect themselves of being affected by the Unitarian heresy. Over against this criticism of the Register-Review we desire to put the opinion of Mrs. Ida Harrison, of Lexington, Ky., who read one of the papers before the Congress and who was an intelligent and interested observer of all that was said and done. She was impressed with "the strong emphasis laid upon the divinity of Christ," by the different speakers and writers. Is it possible that Lexington is being infected with the Unitarian tendency?

—Our brethren of the Presbyterian fold are having an interesting time with Prof. McGiffert at Minneapolis. After a majority and minority report on the subject, followed by a heated discusaion, the erring professor has been turned over to the New York Presbytery for such treatment as that body may see proper to extend to him. This is probably the wisest disposition that could have been made of the matter after it had been brought before the General Assembly. After awhile we think our Presbyterian brethren will learn that these cases are the quickest cured by letting them alone, except as one critic may overturn or modify the views of another. Ecclesiastical courts cannot regulate critical conclusions.

—The 6th annual meeting of the fifth missionary district of Illinois will be held at Waverly, June 6-8. A good program has been prepared and a good convention is anticipated by the district board.

—The American Humane Association, 506 Wabash Ave., Chicago, has recently issued a pamphlet citing instances in various cities of the world where human vivisection is practiced under pretense of scientific research and investigation. If the cases cited are true in the sense in which they appear there is unquestionably an exaltation of scientific research above all moral considerations and worthy of the severest condemnation. The torture of dumb animals for knowledge is bad enough, but the sacrifice of living souls to the god of inquisitiveness is quite beyond the pale of a Christian civilization, and we are glad that the Humane Association is calling the attention of the world to this barbarous custom.

—When a man has a toothache in Cuba he goes to the nearest silversmith, buys a small silver tooth corresponding in size and shape to the one that troubles him, and gives it to the priest to be laid before the saint who is supposed to be most sympathetic and compassionate in toothache cases. If the trouble is a stomachache, he buys a silver stomach; and if he has a nosebleed, he can get a silver nose. Every organ or member of the body that is within the range of the Cuban's anatomical knowledge is imitated in silver; so that no matter where he has a pain, he can get a model of the affected part in silver to lay before his saint with a prayer for relief. What the priests ultimately do with these little silver models of limbs and viscera I don't know; but I presume they melt them up, sell them and use the proceeds to pay for the beer with which they treat their parishioners at such Sunday dances as the one that I attended in Baracoa on the first day of the new year.—George Kennan, in the Outlook.

It would appear from this that a little judicious expansion of "the little red schoolhouse" and kingdom of God into Cuba is about what is needed.

—Remember the Missouri Christian Sunday-school Convention at Plattsburg, June 12-15. Missouri never fails to have a great Sunday-school convention. If you are a worker in the Sunday-school you cannot afford to miss it. If not, you should go in order to become a worker.

—The political pot is already beginning to boil, preliminary to the great quadrennial contest of 1900. Henceforth it will be necessary for preachers and editors of religious papers to tread softly lest they step on somebody's political corns. Would that the interim of peace and the slumber of party passions might be extended.

—In a brief note from Sister Hugley, of Paris, Mo., we learn of the death of her dear husband, Jacob Hugley, on the 6th ult. after a long illness. In some way the notice of Bro. Hugley's death had escaped our attention. No doubt, suitable notice will be sent us concerning the death of this good man. We can here only express our high appreciation of him as a pure, devoted Christian man, and a faithful, earnest preacher of the gospel of Christ. Our Christian sympathies are tendered to his beloved wife. This paper has had no truer friend than Bro. Hugley, and the cause has had no higher exemplification in the life and labors of any man in the state than in that of Bro. Hugley. Blessed be the memory of such a man!

—The Prohibition party of Iowa met last week in DesMoines in convention. The Christian Church was not as fully represented as it should have been. The following brethren were present, J. M. Rudy, of Cedar Rapids; W. J. Hasty, of Maxwell; S. M. Perkins, of Council Bluffs; Jesse Reed and Bro. Holden, of Delta; A. R. Coats, of Perry; Pastor Fisher, of Delta; J. A. Walters, of Minburn; Geo. Pugsley, of Woodbine; A. M. Haggard, J. H. Ragan and Allen Hickey, of Des Moines. This list may not be complete, but is substantially so. John G. Woolley was invited to speak at chapel in Drake University, but could not on account of previous engagement.

—The Bible College of Drake University this year has enrolled 120. Three are pursuing postgraduate work, 13 will appear in the graduating class of '99, 38 others are in collegiate classes and 66 are in the academic grades. The Bible College for the coming year will have the largest corps of instructors in its history.

—While believing in liberty for the investigation of truth, and in giving "elbow room" to those who are making a specialty of such studies, Dr. Noble by no means endorses all the rash things that are being said by those who call themselves liberal. He says:

To affirm that the incarnate Son of God has no actual pre-existence is to lead the church toward Unitarianism. To affirm that Whittier and Tennyson and Browning were just as much inspired, and some more inspired, than some of the Bible authors is to make a statement which by its very extravagance is self-corrective; but the tendency of such an affirmation is to discredit all inspiration and to lower the Scriptures to the level of any other literature of any other people. To affirm that the account of the fall of man is only a clumsy myth and that as a matter of fact when man fell he fell not downward, but upward, is to make evolution the chief factor in the redemption of the race, and to remand Christ and the atonement made by him to a subordinate place. . . . . But what is to be done? In my judgment the wise plan—because it seems to be the plan which promises to do the least mischief—is to make protest and wait. The church now has not heresy to fear as much as lunacy. Heresy trials do no good. The ultimate settlement of all questions of belief must come, and it can only come through free discussion. This often means long waiting, but it is better to wait and to suffer the consequences of waiting than to use compulsion in the attempt to correct ideas. It is only by the backward and forward flying of the shuttle of unhindered thought that the full and perfect web will be woven.

—The Y. M. C. A. managers of the leading Iowa colleges for a number of years have arranged a field meet for the athletes of the colleges to contest for honors and prizes. The meet for 1899 was in DesMoines, May 26th. This year Drake University carried off the honors by a score of 49 points. The State University stood second with 32 points and Grinnell third with 28 points. For four years previous Grinnell carried off the hor ors. Out of six state records broken, Drake has two. The high code of morals and the grade of scholarsip required of contestants are points of especial interest to readers of this journal.

—The Courier-Journal, April 22nd, contains a lengthy editorial condemning the action of a certain "influential church" of Louisville, Ky., whereby manufacturers of distilled spirits are barred from its fellowship. In this sickly defense of distillers the writer of this article could not more clearly bid for the support of the liquor power if it were a candidate for some high office on a strictly anti-Prohibition party ticket. Its defense of religious systems that admit such men into their fellowship in good standing is entirely gratuitous. The world is under but little debt to such religious systems and such men for any progress that it has made in good order, good society, or good morals, to say nothing of a pure Christianity.

—In a recent number of Leaves of Healing, the journal published by John Alex. Dowie, the Chicago faith healer, there was an alleged "testimony" from a person who said he had been cured of a cancer from which she had suffered eight years. We have long been harassed with doubts concerning the claims of Dr. Dowie, and we forwarded the clipping from his sheet to Dr. Howard Coutcher, one of the foremost surgeons of America, with the query, "Does a cancer run eight years? His answer is given below:

No; cancer does not run eight years, nor five years, nor four years, but unless arrested by operation in the very earliest stages, terminates in death in about thirty-three to thirty-six months.

So much for John Alexander! He cures cancers which are not cancers, consumption which is not consumption, and other things which are something else. And that's about the size of it!

—If you failed to read Bro. Ely's account of the condition of things in Kirksville since the cyclone and the needs of our members there, which was printed in our issue of the 18th ult., please turn back to it and read it, and then act in the matter as your heart may prompt. We intended calling attention to this article at the time, but in the midst of other matters it escaped our attention.

—I read with delight your answer to Bro. McCaine, author of "One Dark Spot," in your issue of May 11th. J. H. DAVIS.

—Last week three Presbyterian General Assemblies were in session, the Northern Presbyterians at Minneapolis, the Southern at Richmond and the Cumberland at Denver. These three bodies together represent an important part of the religious forces of this country.

—The Church of Christ at Dixon, Ill., will not soon forget Lord's day, May 21st. On this day the mortgages, notes, etc., representing an indebtedness of $3,600 were burned. The churches of Sterling and Pine Creek united with them in this jubilee service. The church is now hopeful of better things. The placing of the church out of debt is due to the untiring work of the pastor, S. H. Zendt.

—The convention of the second Kansas missionary district will be held at Olathe, June June 13-15. Concerning this very promising convention Everett N. Phillips says:

Every worker interested in the advance of our second district work is urged to be present at our convention with a full delegation. Our state constitution now demands a delegated convention. You are expected to elect representatives from your congregations to the district conventions. The district convention will also elect representatives to the state convention. We are hoping for much for next year. In proportion to your response will this hope be realized.

—The Missouri brethren, et al., will be greatly interested in the program of the State Bible-school Convention in this paper. This is one of the conventions that never fails of a large attendance, great enthusiasm and deep interest. The program will give you a foretaste of the good things to appear at this year's convention. Do not fail to read it whether you can attend or not.

Moses E. Lard.

On our first page this week we present a good likeness of Moses E. Lard, a man who, in his day, occupied a prominent position among us and exerted a wide influence in this Reformation. The following brief historical sketch of Bro. Lard is from the pen of his daughter, Mrs. R. D. Shannon, of Warrensburg, Mo.:

Moses E. Lard was born Oct. 29, 1818, in the state of Tennessee, but came with his parents to Missouri while a young boy. His early life was a bitter struggle with poverty. He inherited a deep religious feeling from his good Christian mother. He says of himself that when he started out into the world all he carried with him was his mother's blessing and the New Testament which she gave him. On Aug. 15, 1842, he was married to Mary Ann Riffe, of Ray county, Mo. Of this union ten children were born, eight of whom are still living. His ambition in life was to obtain an education that he might be able to preach the gospel. To this end he went to Bethany College in 1845, taking his wife and two children with him. To his faithful wife he often said he owed his success in life. They remained there four years, four months and four days. He completed the full college course; was a fine scholar in Latin, Greek and Hebrew and graduated with the honors of his class, while Alexander Campbell was its president. His labors all over the states of Missouri and Kentucky are known to hosts of our brotherhood He was editor of the Quarterly and Apostolic Times for a number of years, and author of a Commentary on Romans. He was the friend and helper of Christian College at Columbia, Mo., and of Hamilton College at Lexington, Ky. He was instrumental in sending more young men to Bethany College than any other preacher among the Disciples. His whole life was given to the service of his Master.

As a writer and preacher along the special lines of his study, Bro. Lard has had no superior among us, if indeed he has had an equal. In an article in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST by his old-time friend, G. W. Longan, written at the time of Bro. Lard's death, he gives it as his conviction that in the powers of imagination and description Bro. Lard had rarely, if ever, been surpassed in the American pulpit. He cites as an instance a remarkable sermon which he preached on the words, "Remember Lot's wife," in which the description of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah is given so vividly and lifelike that the people would actually squirm in their seats as he would seem to be picking the bit of flame from his garments. This feature of his powers also entered into his writings, and some of his Quarterly articles ranked very high as literature. "My First Meeting," "Solomon's Confession," "Dick and Old South Point," "The Temptation of Christ," are articles that will be read for generations to come and will not fail to draw tears from the eyes of the reader. Few men, whether in the pulpit or on the platform, could hold an audience under such a thrall by the power of his eloquence as Moses E. Lard. Long will his fame endure among the churches of Christ associated with this Reformation as a mighty preaches of the gospel—the pure, simple, old gospel of Jesus Christ. Many of our readers that never had the opportunity before of looking upon his features will be glad to have the privilege of preserving this picture of one who wrought so mightily in behalf of the plea for the return of New Testament Christianity.

PERSONAL MENTION.

R. L. Lotz changes his address from Mapleton, O., to Pratt, Kan., having taken the work there.

M. Pittman removes from Elizabeth City, N. C., to New Orleans, La.

K. W. White goes from Potwin, Kan., to Columbia, Mo.

J. P. Lewis is now located at Starke instead of Plant City, Fla.

R. W. Woodside, late of LeRoy, is now at Augusta, Kan.

W. B. Woodside leaves LeRoy for Wilmot, Kan.

T. W. McDonald, of class '99, Drake University, has located at Jefferson, Ia.

A. B. Philputt, of Indianapolis, Ind., will deliver the baccalaureate sermon at Drake University on Sunday, June 11.

Dr. F. W. Gunsaulus, of Chicago, will deliver the commencement address at Drake University on June 15.

S. J. Carter, class '99 of Drake University, will preach June 4 at Rock Rapids, Ia.

Pastor McOnery, of De Soto, Ia., delivered the baccalaureate sermon for the Exira High School.

George Pugsley, of Woodbine, Ia., is the nominee of the Prohibition party for leutenant governor.

R. M. Marshall will close his labors in Belle Vernon, Pa., June 11. He has been pastor two years at that place.

E. T. McFarland delivered the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class of the high school at Stuart, Ia.

D. N. Wetzel, who took up the work left by Miss Wanghop in the English department of Eureka College, preached the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class of the Rutland (Ill.) High School this year.

J. W. Ball began preaching for the church at Waterville, Kan., May 1. He was at Florence, Kan.

F. F. Wyatt, of Joplin, Mo., has been called to preach for the church at Panora, Ia., during the month of June.

G. A. Hess, of Waldron, Ill, can be secured to preach for some church in need of a preacher.

D. R. Dungan, pastor of Mt. Cabanne Church, this city, delivered the baccalaureate sermon for Christian College, Columbia, Mo., last Lord's day.

Pastor I. N. McCash, on the 28th, at morning service had present in the University Place Church Crocker Post G. A. R., the Relief Corps and the Sons of Veterans, three hundred in all.

T. A. Abbott, corresponding secretary of the Missouri State Mission Board has removed from St. Louis to Kansas City, Mo. His address in Kansas City is 1123 Oak Street.

W. A. Gardner, of Honolulu, writes: "My health is improving—indeed I am quite well and shall be ready to return to the United States by January 1900."

Prof. Ed Amherst Ott, of Drake University, has given more educational addresses this spring, perhaps, than any other Des Moines man.

Chancellor W. B. Craig is under consideration as president of the Colorado Agricultural College. Iowa and Drake University are very much agitated for fear they will lose him.

J. E. Hawes, singing evangelist, Ada, O., says that he has seen service in eighteen states during nearly thirteen years and is unimpaired in strength and fitness for work. He can be secured for June or July by addressing him at Ada.

M. G. E. Benntt, of Des Moines, Ia., who graduates from the Drake School of Oratory and English in June, will locate with the church at Clarion, Ia., to succeed J. E. Denton, who recently resigned to accept the work at Onawa, Ia.

C. C. Rowlison spent last Lord's day in this city on his way to Indianapolis, where he goes this week to enter upon his work as pastor of the Third Church in that city. He was pressed into service and preached for the Beulah Church on Sunday, morning and evening.

Frank A. Powell, of McMinnville, Oregon, closed his work at that place May 28, and started East the next day. It is his purpose to make his home in Topeka, Kansas, and devote his time to evangelistic work and lecturing.

The Disciples' Divinity House tendered a reception to Dr. and Mrs. H. L. Willett at Haskell Museum last Tuesday evening. A very enjoyable evening was spent. Bro. Willett reports things in Europe progressing nicely.—Christian Oracle.

Prof. J. G. Park has resigned his position in the Ohio Normal University at Ada, Ohio, to take effect August 1st. He will continue to reside in Ada, and will also continue his large class in Bible School of four hundred young men and women. He is a deacon and one of the leading spirits in the Church of Christ at Ada.

Baxter Waters, of Canton, Mo., who has recently completed the divinity course at Yale, occupied the pulpit of the Central Church in this city last Lord's day, morning and evening, and will act as supply until the pastor elect arrives.

Carey E. Morgan, pastor of the Christian Church at Minneapolis, received a very hearty call from the Central Christian Church of this city last Lord's day to begin his labors the first of September next. It is understood that Bro. Morgan will accept the call, and we feel that the church and the preacher both are to be congratulated on this arrangement.

E. M. Smith, late pastor of Beulah Christian Church, this city, writing from Vigor, Va., says: "I am here, my old home, with my family, living over again the days of long ago—hunting, fishing, wheeling, reading, visiting—taking things easy in general. It is my purpose to spend most of the summer off duty in Virginia, but will return to St. Louis by-and-by, ready to locate somewhere and settle down to hard work.

Thos. B. Bryan, of Chicago, has made a generous offer, through W. S. Broadhurst, of a church building located in North Galveston, Tex., to our Home Missionary Society, for use exclusively as a church, and we understand that the offer has been accepted and that arrangements will be made to utilize it for that purpose. North Galveston is a peninsula extending down into Galveston Bay, and is about 12 miles north of the city of Galveston—a very desirable locality for a winter resort of people from the North.

The Ohio State Convention.

The Ohio State Convention met this year at Wilmington. The attendance was not so large as usual. Many are waiting to go to Cincinnati in October. The first sessions—Monday night and Tuesday—were given to the C. W. B. M. Sister Moses gave the opening address on Monday night, which was one of the clearest, most comprehensive and admirable addresses of the convention. Time and space will not admit of special notice of each address, but all were good and practical. The state secretary, Miss Mary Lyons, reported 225 auxiliaries, with 4,257 members. These 4,257 women raised for national and state work $9,933.95, or an average of $2.34 each. The work of the C. W. B. M. in Ohio prospers. Miss Lyons is retained as secretary with increase of salary.

Tuesday night was the opening of the O. C. M. S. R. Moffett made the annual report of the board, which was scattered in printed form. From this it is learned that 45 men were employed for greater or less time in the past year. They rendered 5,779 days of service. Two thousand seven hundred and ninety-four sermons and addresses were made. They baptized 641 people and fellowshiped 554 others. Fifty-four churches were assisted. One was revived, and twelve new ones organized. Twelve new Sunday-schools were started, and forty-two conventions held. Collections and bequests amounted to $13,780.01. For all purposes the Ohio Disciples gave $57,307.84. This was not one dollar per capita. President H. McDiarmid beidg sick and not able to attend, R. W. Abberly, of Columbus, the vice-president, presided over the convention. Pres. E. V. Zollars took Prof. McDiarmid's place on the program by a very strong sermon on "The Wonderful Man."

Wednesday morning session was given to educational interests. This was a new feature in an Ohio convention. But it was a success. O. G. Hertzog, educational secretary, made his report. Supt. F. Trendley, of Youngstown, gave a magnificent address on "Our Obligation to Education." This address is worthy of study. A symposium on "Our Attitude and Relation to Education" was participated in by C. A. Freer, of Columbus, who spoke on "The Preacher." I. J. Cahill, of Dayton, called attention to the responsibility of "The Church." J. A. Lord told of the attitude and relation of "The Paper." Following this symposium, Pres. Zollars spoke to edification on "College Endowment," and particularly on the popular endowment of Hiram. No people can be a great people without colleges. We cannot have colleges without endowment. In all this session there was one common thought—we must stand by our own schools and make them better.

Wednesday afternoon was the C. E. session. The report of the state superintendent reported a small decrease in societies and membership, but large offerings and a growth in systematic giving. Ed Bower, of Marietta, spoke on "C. E. and Ohio Missions." L. G. Bateman, of Mansfield, spoke on "C. E., Retrospective and Prospective." J. N. Green told of the "Truth Legion." A symposium on "'99" was participated in by R. W. Abberly for Columbus, C. W. Huffer for Detroit and A. W. Taylor for Cincinnati. M. L. Bates, of Newark, led a helpful and suggestive pastors' conference.

Wednesday night Robert Moffett gave a "Retrospect" of 47 years of Ohio work. This will be published. A. M. Harvuot spoke for "Ohio Missions to the Front." This grew out of a need. But Ohio, while lagging a little for a year or two, has only been catching her breath for a new effort, and will now start on a new crusade of "50 new churches and $10,000 for this year." This can be done easily.

Thursday morning A. M. Harvuot conducted a helpful conference on "City Evangelization." W. D. Moore, one of the faithful and honored pioneers, spoke on "Then and Now." This was a rich feast. The pioneers knew the Word of God, they believed the Word of God. They met the needs of the time boldly and victoriously. We now have new problems, but we must meet them as boldly and victoriously as did the pioneers. R. P. Shepherd spoke on the "Debt to the Pioneers."

Thursday afternoon was given to considering the Sunday-school interest. This session was participated in by A. M. Chamberlain, G. B. Townsend, R. W. Abberly, Benj. L. Smith and A. McLean.

Thursday night was given to the Jubilee. Some new features are to be introduced into the management of Ohio work next year. The work will be more centralized. There will be but one treasury—that the state. District funds, so far as the general funds are concerned, will be done away. Districts may do special work. The retiring of R. Moffett from the secretaryship was the occasion for the expression of much feeling. Ohio Disciples love Bro. Moffett. He has done valiant service. He is a great man. He is preacher, organizer, executor and seer all in one. The Ohio and American societies ought to give him a pension for life.

S. H. Bartlett, of Painesville, becomes corresponding secretary July first. He undertakes a big job. He can succeed only as Ohio Disciples stand by him, and especially the preachers. Judging them by the past, this they will do. There is plenty of work yet in Ohio. Thirty county-seats are without an organized body of those simply Disciples. Twelve counties have only one church in each. Many places cry for help.

After a warm contest Mansfield captured the convention for next year. If applause is any expression of sentiment, Ohio Disciples still believe in the Old Book and the power of the primitive gospel. Send the war cry along the line, "50 new churches and $10,000 this year." "Ohio Missions to the Front." Much more might be said, but this report is now too long.

F.

F. D. Petitt, a graduate of Drake University, has gone to the better world. Among our Iowa churches, especially, and with the prohibition workers he was much beloved.

FREE TO SUFFERERS.

The New Cure for Kidney, Bladder and Uric Acid Troubles.

Almost everybody who reads the newspapers is sure to know of the wonderful cures made by Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy.

It is the great medical triumph of the nineteenth century; discovered after years of scientific research by Dr. Kilmer, the eminent kidney and bladder specialist, and is wonderfully successful in promptly curing kidney, liver, bladder and uric acid troubles.

Swamp-Root has been tested in so many ways, in hospital work, in private practice, among the helpless too poor to purchase relief, and has proved so successful in every case that a special arrangement has been made by which all readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, who have not already tried it, may have a sample bottle sent free by mail, also a book telling more about Swamp-Root and how to find out if you have kidney or bladder trouble. When writing mention reading this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and send your address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghampton, N. Y. The regular fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes are sold by all first-class druggists.

The Japanese in Hawaii.

"Pilekea,* plenty pilekea," said my pleasant Hawaiian friend in answer to a question as to a voyage to the Island of Hawaii itself. It was Honolulu and the time November. The soft showers or "liquid sunshine" had begun and splintered rainbows lay in Tantalus' green clefts. We stood on the wide fern-filled veranda. Very peaceful and blue looked the sea beyond, where the black plume of our steamer's smoke waved over the horizon's edge. I had just left the great China steamer, Doric, and all her comforts had but slightly mitigated the horrors of that "inch of hell" as the Japanese proverb calls a sea voyage, and now here was more to face. My friend went on in her graphic way, using English hesitatingly, and falling back, often, into her musical native tongue, punctuating her speech with nods and shoulder shrugs and ending with a wide, pleasant smile.

I forgot the possible sorrows of another sea trip in my admiration as she stood with a poise and grace of form that no trammeled dress had spoiled. From her broad shoulders in full folds fell the skirt of her black holoku. About her bosom was a mesh of lace and a wreath of gardenias — rich, creamy—intertwined with tiny ferns. Above smiled the pleasant brown face, too dark for olive, and with none of the yellow Mongolian tint, and a shade lighter than the cocoa brown of the South Sea race. A wide hat with plumes was set upon the mass of wavy black hair. Laughter and love spoke in the full curves of the lips and gentle kindliness looked out of the dark eyes. There was nothing of the negro; no coarse traits and none of the cold suavity of the Oriental. There were refinement and kind-heartedness, and I was lost in the charm of a new personality. I followed the sweep of her arm as she pointed to where the sea fretted itself into foam against the rocky knees of Diamond Head.

"Plenty pilekea," she repeated, with a long emphasis on the plenty. A weak later we realized her prophecy. When we went again to the pier the little steamer bristled with heads, human and animal. Horses were lifted from the dock by a broad belt which, passing under their bodies, was attached to a windlass. They were lifted, rearing and plunging, high above the deck and then quietly lowered into the hold where they stood crowded and looking up with wonder in their great eyes.

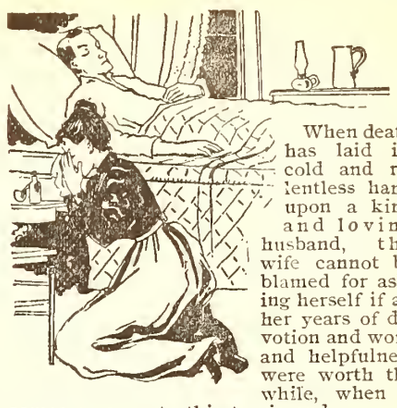
On the lower deck were packed the Japanese laborers. True to old habits, they had spread down pieces of matting, and sat upon the decks, their yellow faces stolid with misery at the prospect of another sea voyage.

They had left their loved Nihon,† moved to go to the foreign land where harvests never fail. For with them life was existence only, a hard struggle to push the wolf's sharp nose outside the door. Then, too, there were earthquake shocks that rocked the mountains on their granite bases and spilled the burning lava floods over their fields and villages. Then came the floods—in spite of their hourly prayers and offerings heaped on Inari's‡ shrine. The bitter waters crept high till they touched the golden grain fields as they laughed in their harvest beauty and joy, but over it all poured the flood with ooze and slime, and as the peasant saw his year's work lost he wrung his hands and let the iron rankle in his soul. For the god's, perverse implacable, fickle—who can before their wrath? But hunger carries a stand sharp goad, and so they went out in boats over the submerged fields and reaching down caught and cut off a few heads to stave off death a little longer.

Then came word of a wonderful kwaisha or company that would take one free across the great Pease Water, and pay $15 per month wage, with one whole day in the week for rest; and so they left the old parents and little ones and came. They brought all their possessions, wrapped tight in a red blanket and slung across the shoulders. They were packed in the great ship's hold with the hated Pake (Chinaman), breathing the fumes of his opium smoke, with "slum" or sloppy stew and rice for daily fare. They lay always on the hard board beds, while above stood the ijin or white barbarians, looking down on them as souls in Buddha's lotus lake might look on the tormented in Yemma's hell. Then, after long days of terrible pitching, they had come to a summerland, fair as lovely Kii, whose feet are in the warm swirl of the Black Salt Water. Here they were huddled into quarantine like sheep, and after three weeks taken out and loaded upon our little steamer. Undemonstrative and steeled to silent endurance by centuries of toil and suffering, they stood in sharp contrast to the demonstrative, light-hearted Hawaiians. These brought ropes or leis of flowers to hang about the shoulders of their departing friends. There were tears, loud, affectionate farewells, kisses, last handshakes and a chorus of *Alohas as the steamer moved off.

"Choppy," our friend had said of the channel, and choppy we found it when, added to the pitch and rear of the ship over the swells was a sidewise tilter that drove the bravest to their berths. Only the officers and Chinese waiters were left on the blistering decks, for the sun was fierce, though a cool land breeze blew. Wherever we touched we saw the people silently leave in boats, cowed and wretched with mal de mer. After seventeen hours of solid suffering we came to Kona, the new coffee district on the leeward side of Hawaii. Here, scattered on the mountainside, were a few Hawaiians' huts. Yuans were of daily occurrence, for the natives love nothing so well as a feast. It is his delight to kill his only cow or pig, build a fire in the stone-lined, underground oven, pour water upon the hot rocks and lay the animal wrapped in tii leaves within and roast it whole. Then the best mats are spread under the orange or tamarind tree, the meat is flanked with large calabashes of pai, the Hawaiian staff of life, and sweetmeats made of cocoanuts and sweet potatoes. There are no dishes but tii leaves, no forks and spoons but nature's own. Two or three fingered pai is served. The guests come unbidden from far and near and all wear leis. Guitars and native lutes are strung, and while the sake-bowls go around, with dancing, singing and feasting, the happy hours steal away. What cares he if the guava and lantana thickets grow upon the fat land; for his little taro patch furnishes pai, and with his canoe he can get fish, and if the leper inspector's time comes near, one can hie away to a straw hut in the mountains till the danger is past.

But now comes this stocky alien race, with Aino taint in their blood, knowing only how to work and asking only work to do, with a mighty patience born of centuries of hard farming and battles with a worsting fate. His unsavory little cabins dot the mountain over. The guavas crash before his axe and his brush fires burn thick at night. If it rains he puts on his oil paper coat and works on. The women work too with their blue kerchief bound around their heads and narrow kimono skirts tucked up, showing stubby ankles and pigeon toes. Their naked, brown babies play on the lava flows—for it lies as if just cooled, with crinkled surfaces and the scant soil washed into its depressions. Soon the young coffee or cane make faint green lines upon the brown and few months later you can look down seaward, over another sea, fragrant, billowy, dashed with the snowy spray of coffee bloom and hear the rustle and swish of the cane blades. His hard hands have wrought it all, and still he toils and knows no better things.



But Christ is to come to him, the gentle and merciful—stronger than Hachiman, more loving than Kwonnon who, when he comes, shall fill the dark cabin with love and the darker heart with light and peace. Some have already found him and gone back to the old, loved Nippon to carry the gleam to dark places there. Our sister, Alice Beard, with her own means supports a Japanese worker and the good work is begun, but more is needed; for the Hawaiians, the Chinese, the Portuguese and godless whites pack the coast villages and traverse the mountain roads. They all wait for him while he waits for interpreters and intercessors—for human faces from which to shed his Spirit's love and pity; for human hands with which to minister and help them. The Japanese offers special inducements for work. He has none of the sloth of the native of the tropics, and to help him there brings Christ nearer to Japan and then to the great East.

In June I purpose to return to Honolulu together with my mother and little adopted daughter. I am thankful for the opportunity to go—to have no family ties to draw me away from the work and that our little girl may learn again her own tongue and know her own people. To the friends who with prayers and offerings have helped me my Master will give his sure reward, even should I be unworthy; but who would not strive to serve worthily one so patient and so kind? Offerings for my return trip have been received from Japanese brethren at Kona, $1.50; church, Manville, Ind., $17; church, Salem, Ind., $16.50; Mrs. Rogers, Nortonville, Kan., $1.75; Mrs. Hopper, Honolulu, $5; J. V. Coombs, Irvington, Ind., $1; Mrs. Deweese, Cherryvale, Kan., $1; Mrs. S. R. Hall, Emporia, Kan., $13; Mr. Gill, Wichita, $5; Mrs. Milton, Fort Scott, Kan, $1; Mrs. Burton, Emporia, $1; Mrs. W. H. Boyles, Emporia, $1; Mrs. M. J. Beal, Topeka, $5.

CALLA J. HARRISON.

†Japan. ‡The rice god.

*Hawaiian, farewell—love to you.

When death has laid its cold and relentless hand upon a kind and loving husband, the wife cannot be blamed for asking herself if all her years of devotion and work and helpfulness were worth the while, when it comes so soon to this tragic end.

If men would only take the most common sense precautions against the encroachments of ill-health, there would be fewer houses of mourning, and fewer women left alone almost helpless before the battle of life is half over. A man's liver and stomach are twin machines that work together, either to make or unmake. If they work wrong, they deplete and poison his blood. Impure and impoverished blood mean sickness and death. If they work right, they purify and enrich the blood. A man whose blood is rich and pure, and whose liver is active cannot well be unhealthy. Headaches, biliousness, indigestion and costiveness, which men generally disregard, are Nature's warnings that the twin mechanism, stomach and liver, is working against, instead of for him. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is the best medicine to use under these circumstances. It creates appetite, corrects all disorders of the digestion, invigorates the liver and fills the arteries with rich, red, healthy blood. As an invigorating, restorative tonic, it is far superior to all the malt extracts. It is the great blood-maker and flesh-builder. It does not build sickly, flabby fat as cod liver oil does, but the firm, muscular tissues of health.

"For the last nine years," writes William Miller, Esq., of 651 Mulberry Street, Reading, Pa., "I have been very poor in health. I suffered with a running sore leg. I tried many kinds of different medicines, and doctors without relief. Then I used three bottles of 'Golden Medical Discovery' and can say that I am entirely cured. I can now do as good a day's work as the next man."

Unfailable—Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets for constipation and biliousness.

Chicago Letter.

"Can a Man Succeed in Business in Chicago and Retain his Christian Character?" This was the subject of last Sunday's sermon by Bruce Brown at the West Side Christian Church as reported in one of the great Chicago papers. A number of prominent business men had written Bro. Brown answers in reply to the above question. Most of them answered in the affirmative, for "no Christian man can put gold above God, currency above Christ or coin above character." But the sad effect which our Christless competitive system is having upon some of our Christian business men is evident. Reader, is the greed for gain blinding yours piritual vision? Read—think—pray.

God or Mammon—Which? Strange that intelligent business men should hesitate to choose God or fail to see what a fine business man Christ was. While only two out of ten prominent business men in replying to Bro. Brown took the view that in Chicago business success and Christian character are incompatible. Reader, are you willing to sell your soul to Satan to gain the world? Would you rather lie than pay your taxes? Read the following: A manufacturer wrote: "My opinion is that the conditions to be met are such that a successful business man must strangle his conscience. He must produce cheap goods, which means that he must become an oppressor by grinding down his employes and using machinery that makes one man do the work of several. To meet competition he must use willful misrepresentations in the sale of his goods." A property owner wrote: "In order to pay only your honest share of taxes one must become dishonest and swear to a lie. He must become an oppressor of the poor. He must perjure himself and engage attorneys to use unscrupulous methods to protect his interests from men who propose to rob him by the same methods."

Chicago has passed the two-million mark. The city continues to grow more rapidly than ever. This is remarkable, but the health of Chicago is still more remarkable. The Health Department of Chicago has prepared a table showing that the duration of life has steadily increased since 1872. In that year the average age of decedents in Chicago was fifteen years. In 1882 it was nineteen years. In 1992 it was twenty-two years and in 1898 twenty-nine years. It seems hardly credible that the average age in Chicago should nearly double in thirty years. Even more remarkable than the average increase of the longevity in Chicagoans' ages is the fact that there has been a reduction of thirty per cent. in the proportion of deaths under one year old. The Times-Herald, commenting upon this report, says: "This remarkable reduction of infant mortality altogether overshadows in sanitary importance the increasing proportion of those who live to the middle arch of life (45-55 years) and beyond." In 1888 the death rate of Chicago was 18 per thousand; in '98 it was 12 per thousand. Chicago is by far the healthiest great city in the world. New York spends over one million dollars annually on its health department, while Chicago does not spend over one-fifth of that amount.

The Christian Ministers' Meeting has had two interesting sessions since our last Chicago Letter. Dr. Campbell, our "Christian-Congregationalist," read a fine paper on the "Doctrine of the Presence." He made an earnest plea for the full recognition of the spiritual presence of the living Christ. The early church did not draw a sharp distinction between the Holy Spirit and the Spirit of our Lord. Dr. Campbell's paper was full of clear, crisp sentences which are characteristic of his style. Last Monday the association went to Austin where Evangelist Chas. Reign Scoville (with his excellent singers, Mr. Houston and Miss McCormick) is holding a meeting. Bro. Scoville read a paper on "How to hold a meeting." He has been very successful in holding gospel meetings. He had over twelve hundred additions during eight months last year and eight hundred during the first four months of this year. I have only space to mention the various committees recommended in his paper. 1. Executive; 2. Advertising; 3. Canvassing; 4. Devotional; 5. Financial.

Should business men preach the gospel? Some questions can best be answered by a statement of fact. One of the best and most faithful preachers in Chicago is a business man. Bro. Charles W. Dean, who has a government position in Chicago, lives in Harvey and preaches regularly for the Christian Church at that place. When I worked in California Bro. B. F. Coulter, of Los Angeles, was my ideal business man. In integrity and earnestness Bro. Dean reminds one very much of Bro. Coulter. The church at Harvey has had a hard struggle. The membership numbers about seventy. Ninety in S. S. and seventy-five in the C. E. Society. Harvey is a typical factory town where the people for the most part spend Lord's days sleeping, or smoking and gossiping. This church deserves the sympathy and support of our missionary societies. We firmly advocate a thoroughly educated ministry, but when well-informed business men who are constant students of the Word of God do such excellent work as Bro. Dean is doing at Harvey we also say, Give us more business men preachers for these struggling churches. Dear reader, if you are a busy business man without an adequate channel for the activity which your spiritual growth demands, find a struggling church in your community unable to support a regular pastor and save the church and your own soul by doing some genuine Bible study and sledgehammer preaching. Every Christian should be a prophet of God as well as a king and a priest.

The new officers of the Christian Ministers' Association of Chicago are G. A. Campbell, president; Bruce Brown, vice-president and F. L. Childs, secretary. Bro. Childs is a business man and superintendent of the Monroe St. Church Sunday-school. Bro. Campbell has been the life of our preachers' meetings for the last three years.

Dr. H. L. Willett and Mrs. Willett returned to Chicago last week. Dr. Willett preached a most excellent sermon to a crowded hall for the Hyde Park Church last Lord's day. He was also tendered a reception at the University of Chicago by the Disciples' Divinity House. The reception was attended by the finest and most representative body of Chicago Disciples that has ever been entertained by the Divinity House dean and students. Prof. Matthews, of the Divinity School, Dr. Campbell, our "Christian-Congregationalist," and Bro. Tyrrell made brief impromptu speeches, and Mrs. Gates recited "Afterwhile."

The University of Chicago offers an unusually fine program for the summer quarter. Dr. Harper gives a course in the wisdom literature of the Bible. Geo. Adam Smith, a course on the Psalms. Prof. Moulton gives a fine course on Milton's Paradise Lost. A fuller report of this work will be given in the next Chicago Letter. Those desiring special information concerning this fine bill of fare—literary, biblical, etc.—should write Dr. H. L. Willett, care University of Chicago.

"There is a reaper whose name is death,
And with his sickle keen,
He reaps the bearded grain at a breath,
And the flowers that grow between."

The father of Bro. Errett Gates, pastor of the Hyde Park Church, died last week. He was one of our older preachers and lived to be eighty-five years of age. Bro. Gates has the sympathy of his many friends.

"There is no death,
What seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but the suburb of the fields elysian,
Whose portal we call death."

C. A. Young.

New York Letter.

Bro. J. M. Philputt, of Lenox Ave. Church, 119th St., and the writer had the pleasure of an exchange of pulpits Sunday evening, May 21st. The 169th St. people were much pleased with his discourse, and glad to have him once again in the pulpit which he occupied as pastor for a period of four years. We are all delighted to know Bro. Philputt's purpose as announced at the Philadeldhia Conference recently to discontinue the separate congregational fellowship feature that has obtained hitherto in his church work in Harlem. Unquestionably this is a wise decision and one that will prove a great blessing in his work. Though we have not been in full sympathy with his methods and pracrices in this matter, we now herewith promise hearty sympathy and all needed help possible in his work whenever this unnecessary and misleading policy is abandoned. Personally J. M. Philputt is an excellent man and has done a good work. He has a goodly congregation occupying a splendid house of worship in one of the very best fields for Christian work in New York. This was the first time I had preached in his pulpit and was pleased with the royal reception his people gave me; they were kind enough to say they enjoyed the sermon and wished for another exchange. Bro. Philputt expects to spend his vacation in Europe.

Bro. J. M. Morris is doing excellent service with the Church of Christ on Sterling Place, Brooklyn. For two years past a number of the members have not been in full sympathy with certain measures and methods there and have refused to work and worship with them. Bro. Morris hopes that the way is now open for reconciliation. The work at Kensington in Brooklyn is doing well and the outlook is hopeful. The church at Greenpoint, same city, has just called as pastor Bro. John Keevil, a recent graduate of the College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky. We hope his work there may be richly blessed of God.

Before this will have been published Bro. W. C. Payne's pastorate will close at 56th St. Church. He preaches his last discourse on the 28th of May. As yet he has not decided where he will locate. It is to be hoped churches in need of a pastor will not allow him to remain idle very long. Bro. D. G. Hertzog, of Hiram College, is in the city and preached for Bro. Payne on Lord's day morning last. He is quietly looking after the financial interests of Hiram. Our New York congregations are gathered from the four quarters of the earth, and sometimes the people and the various places whence they come constitute an interesting study. Recently at a morning service we met worshipers from England, Ireland, Scotland, Germany, Prince Edward Island, the Sandwich Islands, Australia and about a dozen states of own country. Sometimes we have devout men from many (not quite all) nations under heaven. If any Disciple reading this contemplates coming to New York to locate, let me suggest that our section of the city be allowed to present its advantages as a home district. At least do not fail to locate within easy reach of one of our churches. We need your help in our work, and if you live in New York you should have the fellowship of God's people.

A Sad Story, but a Happy Ending.

"During the winter of 1897 I had a very severe attack of La Grippe," writes Mr. D. P. Hall, of Berry Ferry, Ky., "which came very near winding up my earthly career. It left me with rheumatism, catarrh of the head and throat, kidney disease, indigestion, in fact I was a physical wreck. I began taking Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer. I took it regularly for six months, and the result was I got rid of the rheumatism and all of my other troubles. I am in better health to-day than I have been for years."

Los Angeles Letter.

I am a great believer in the power and efficacy of preaching what is known as the first principles of the gospel. With this in mind I have been preparing a series of sermons on the book of Acts. In rambling through my library recently for helps along that line I fell upon a book that I had purchased some months ago, and had stowed safely away without very careful reading. It is entitled "Studies in Acts," and was written by W. J. Lhamon. It is not a book of sermons exactly. It could not be called essays. It certainly is not a commentary in the usual sense of the term. All these factors are combined in it, and it is very appropriately called "Studies." The following are some of the subjects discussed in its pages: The First Sermon after the Ascension, The First Church, The First Persecutions, The First Martyr, The First Gentile Convert, The First Gentile - Christian Church, The First Martyr Apostle, The First Foreign Missionaries, etc. These subjects are discussed in a fresh, thoughtful, scholarly manner. Think what a helpful, suggestive book this will be for any one preparing a series of sermons on "the keybook of the New Testament," as this author calls Acts. I am confident that our preachers of to-day do not sufficiently emphasize this book, that is so vital to a true understanding or presentation of New Testament Christianity. When we fail to emphasize the great truths which differentiate us from the surrounding religious bodies, we shall lose that virility, for which we have thus far been distinguished.

The state of California is dependent upon the rain that falls during the winter months. We have no rainfall of any account between the months of April and November. The rainfall of 1897-'8 was the lightest in many years, and the state suffered very greatly last year as a result of the drought. The rainfall for this winter up to the first of March was even lighter than that of last winter, and as a result there was very great suffering throughout the state and great fears lest we should have the second drought, and that great privations and suffering should follow. The fifteenth day of March was appointed by the churches throughout the state as a day of humiliation, fasting and prayer. On the morning of the sixteenth of March we were all awakened by the welcome sound of the falling drops of rain which continued until the whole state was given a thorough soaking, and the state was thus saved from the terrible calamity that would have resulted from a drought. With the usual amount of rain from now on fairly good crops will be harvested, and our great state will be saved great suffering. The rain coming so soon after the day appointed for prayer has raised afresh the question as to the answer to prayer. The skeptical were bombarding us with questions as to whether or not we expected God to interfere with the laws of nature and procure a rainfall contrary to his laws. The question has been much discussed. It seems to me the question is an easy one. God is greater than the laws of his own making, and is absolutely able to direct them to the accomplishment of his purposes and to use them in answering the prayers of his children. I can see no distinction between God answering the prayer of his children for rain and any other prayer they may make. If rain is the need, then it must be in the range of prayer, and God can as consistently answer this as any other prayer.

The time for our annual offering for Home Missions is at hand. Our secretaries are making a heroic effort to raise $100,000 for the Jubilee Year. They are engaged in a laudable enterprise, and well deserve the sympathy and support of Christian workers throughout our brotherhood. To be able to extend the work into the needed fields is an enterprise upon which the Holy Spirit must look with approval. We ought to strive to please him. Nothing pleases him better than to extend the Church of Christ in the earth. There is no such an important and fertile field in the world as that in which the American Christian Missionary Society operates. "America is another name for opportunity," said Emerson. It is surely the opportunity for our brotherhood to extend its great cause over the lives and consciences of men. It is hoped that our churches everywhere may generously respond to this call. The churches in California as far as they are able ought to liberally respond to this great work. This field is aided in both Northern and Southern California in the support of evangelists. We should as far as possible reciprocate the favor that is bestowed upon us. Let us have a rally all along the line for this Jubilee Year of the Disciples of Christ.

"Men of Yesterday" is a handsome volume of 291 pages from the pen of T. W. Grafton, author of "Life of Alexander Campbell," and from the presses of the Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis. It is a series of character sketches of some of our prominent men: Walter Scott, Barton W. Stone, John Smith, Isaac Errett, Barton W. Johnson and O. A. Burgess. The men are worthy of these sketches, and the sketches are worthy of the men. It is a mistake not to keep before our minds men of this class. Their histories will inspire noble lives in others. The author is happy in his chosen field, happy in the title of book, and happy in the treatment of his subjects. Not long enough to be wearisome, and not so brief as to be unsatisfactory. Busy people and young men and women by the thousands will read such a book, who will not read the larger biographies. A companion volume ought soon to follow.

R. R. Hamlin, of Palestine, has been replying to "Father" Brannon, of the Catholic Church, and judging from a synopsis of one of his replies, he has done his work well. He reviewed him "The Infallibility of the Church," "Invocation of Saints," "Transubstantiation" and "Forgiveness of Sins."

Milford is rejoicing over a new church. Philip F. King preached the dedicatory sermon on the 9th inst., and he and the Bros. Howard are now in a good meeting there.

W. H. Duke has had a hard struggle at Richland, but is victorious. A congregation of 25 members was organized.

R. B. Briney is proving himself a worthy son of his noble father. He followed the completion of their new house at Amarillo with a meeting, and eight souls have been saved, and the town thoroughly shaken up. They now have the prettiest church house in the place and an active membership of 100.

A. J. Bush has recently closed a meeting at Dublin with twenty-three additions, and he is hopeful of a strong church in that growing city soon.

Chas. E. Freeman begins hopefully as pastor at Weatherford. He has had 14 additions since the first of April.

R. P. Shultz is doing well at El Paso. He reports audiences constantly increasing and frequent additions.

Dr. Wm. Hale thinks a good church will soon be organized at Venus, a thrifty town in one of the best sections of the state.

Geo. Van Pelt's meeting at Beaumont was a great success. Sectarianism was so bitter that he could get the use of no church for preaching, and no baptistery for baptizing. But this bitterness reacted on the people, who furnished the auditorium free, and the Electric Light Company charged him nothing for lights; and at the close a generous soul gave him a $500 lot to build on. An organization was effected, and a new house will be built at once in that growing city of 10,000 people. This work was under the auspices of the state board.

CARLTON COLLEGE.

On May 21 I had the honor and pleasure of preaching the baccalaureate sermon of Carlton College, Bonham, Texas. This school was founded in 1867, by Charles Carlton, a graduate of Bethany College. His faiteful wife, "Aunt Sallie," has always been at the side of "Uncle Charley," an invaluable helper in his work. His children, Charlie, Sallie, Joe, Grace and Ella, have all done good work in the faculty, and all are still in ite xcept Ella, who is now the queen of one of Bonham's happiest homes.

From the day the school was inaugurated, until now no time has ever been lost. And during this long period of thirty-two years there has been an average attendance of 250, making a grand total of 8,000 students. Who can tell the great influence of such a school? Many of the leading spirits of the state are among these students.

The valuable property now owned by the school, with the exception of $100, has been earned by it, and there is not a dollar of debt. Isn't this remarkable? Naturally, we expect a school to be constantly appealing to its friends for money. But here is an exception. It is peculiar, also, in the fact that it never canvasses for students, and still they come.

As a healthful, homelike resort, Carlton College has no superior known to me. The atmosphere of home is as sweet and pure and strong as our children can find under the parental roof; and its healthfulness is attested by the fact that there has never been but one death during a history of one-third of a century.

There were nine graduates this year: Misses Tillie Campbell, Edna Bough, Fay Wilson, Ella Scoles, Emega Weartersby, Grace Joe Oldham, Lucie L. Smith, Ella Maness and Eula Smith. Let me say in clear strong tones: Parents, you ought to patronize Carlton College.

Once more, and for the last time, let me urge you to attend our state convention at Ft. Worth, June 5-8.

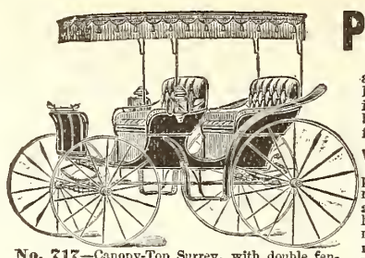
Washington (D. C.) Letter.

The Disciples of Washington are jubilant over a bit of good fortune that has come their way. A ripe plum in the form of a lot and chapel has fallen to us. The location of this new possession enhances its value to us and solves for us a perplexing problem. Our three churches are well situated in strategic centers. The Vermont Avenue Church is in the center of the most important residence section of the city; the Ninth Street Church is finely located upon the highest part of Capitol Hill, and is near the center of the populated district east of the capitol, while the H Street Church is in the heart of the thickly settled section of Southwest Washington.

For some years the principal growth of our city has been in the northwest section. It is likely to continue in the same direction, as we are bounded on the south by the Potomac River and on the east by the Anacostia River. The importance of a church in Mount Pleasant along the line of the city's growth has been recognized by our people here for some time. We were deterred from taking any steps in this direction by the high price for land. For several years Bro. Power has been looking for some brother who had $5,000 to invest for the Lord to start the work. Now what we have been looking for has come to us without our asking. During the Hayes administration a union chapel was opened on Whitney Avenue, west of Seventh Street Extended. F. D. Power preached the dedicatory sermon, and H. C. Stier, one of the Vermont Avenue members, was the first Sunday-school superintendent. Our people contributed toward the purchase of the lot and the erection of the chapel. For twenty years Presbyterian and Methodist brethren have been the leading spirits in the mission and formed a majority on the board of trustees. With the growth of denominational churches of late years the mission has suffered and a change in the conduct of affairs has seemed desirable. Three different denominations tried to secure the property, but the trustees offered to turn it over to us for one year, and promised if we make a success of the work at the end of year to deed the property free of cost to our trustees. The only conditions they impose are (1) that we shall call the church the Whitney Avenue Memorial Christian Church; (2) that in the event a new church is erected we shall not move more than one-quarter of a mile from the present site and shall transfer to the edifice the memorial windows and tablet now in the chapel; (3) that we shall make some needed repairs on the present structure. The Whitney Avenue Memorial Christian Church will be opened the second Sunday in June. The three pastors will conduct in turn Sunday and midweek services until a pastor can be secured. As there are some fifty of our folks living in this section, and as this number is being constantly augmented, we have no fear that the mission will be a failure.



It may seem passing strange to some of our brethren in the West that representatives of "the sects" should come and offer us a property worth $7,000. But this only shows how well we behave ourselves in this region.

The Ninth Street Church continues to prosper. Our audiences are large; 16 added since the close of our meeting in April and nearly $1,000 of the indebtedness of our new church paid during the past year.

Washington is now in holiday attire, celebrating its Peace Jubilee. Large crowds are in attendance. The Spanish war veterans are the recipients of many honors. Our colored citizens are in their glory at the marching of processions and the music of the bands, while the small boys as well as some of the big ones are wild over the fireworks.

A Successful Convention.

The northeast district of Iowa has just closed one of the most successful conventions in its history. It was held in the beautiful little city of Hampton, commencing on Monday evening, May 15, and closing at noon on Thursday, May 18. The program, the attendance and the interest were good throughout. B. S. Denny, formerly secretary of the district, but at the last state convention elected secretary, to succeed A. M. Haggard, now acting dean of the Bible department of Drake University, was a large factor in the development of the northeast district. He is greatly missed. But Sumner T. Martin, pastor of the flourishing church in Mason City, and at the convention just closed elected for the fourth time president of the district, has by his energy and executive ability largely contributed to the continued prosperity of the work. S. B. Ross, pastor of the church at Olwein, who took up the work of secretary in the room of S. B. Denny, has been untiring and devoted in his efforts for the progress of the work in the district.

Sherman Hill and his wife and the church at Hampton, by their gracious hospitality made everything exceedingly pleasant for the delegates and visitors.

Bro. Hill has undertaken a difficult task in taking up the work laid down by Bro. Denny, who was successful and dearly beloved in Hampton. But by his manly Christian bearing and earnest work Bro. Hill will, no doubt, soon equally endear himself to the noble brethren and sisters in Hampton.

Nearly all those on the program were present and faithfully discharged the duty laid upon them by the program committee. This, together with the wisdom displayed in forming the program, contributing in no small degree to the interest and success of the convention. Out of the many good things provided it would be difficult to select anything for special mention. But as we cannot here speak of all, we will refer to just two or three items that may be of particular interest. On Monday evening Bro. J. M. Rudy, of Cedar Rapids, gave an address on "The Gospel and the Social Problems." This was a vigorous grappling with present-day conditions. It was shown that the genuine gospel of Christ faithfully preached and truly practiced is the only real way in which the evils of the world, in this or any other age, can be effectually and permanently cured.

Mrs. Louise Kelly, of Jeffersonville, Ind., one of the national officers of the C. W. B. M., attended the convention, and by her presence and her addresses, greatly helped us. She spoke twice on Tuesday during the sessions of the C. W. B. M. In the afternoon her subject was "Bible Chair Work." She dwelt upon the importance of this as a missionary enterprise, undertaken on behalf of the students attending state universities, where opportunities for becoming acquainted with the Word of God were otherwise few and inadequate. In her evening address she outlined the history, progress and success of the C. W. B. M. work. Sister Kelly is a clear, strong and ethusiastic speaker, and wins the favor of her hearers for the things which she advocates.

W. A. Moore, pastor of the church in Webster City, and president of the northwest district, also attended. In his happy and genial way he presented a subject that is near to his heart, "Boys' Work in the Church." Bro. Moore advocates the formation of "Boys' Brigades" in connection with the church as a method which he considers exceedingly helpful in gaining the boys.

Particular mention may also be made of two papers presented during the Sunday-school and Endeavor sessions of the convention. One was by Sister Wharton, of Nora Springs. "C. E. and Popular Amusement," was the subject. The other was by Sister Hill, of Hampton, on "Primary Work." The writers treated these important subjects in a very excellent manner.

Chancellor Craig was on the program for an address on Wednesday evening. But being unable to be present he sent an excellent substitute in the person of the vice-chancellor, Bro. A. M. Haggard. Bro. Haggard spoke on "Education." He presented his subject in his own hearty, vigorous and enthusiastic manner. His address was well received, and cannot fail to make more friends for higher education, for Bible training and for Drake University.

Our work in Iowa is growing. We now stand second in numbers amongst the Protestant peoples of the state. There could be no better time than the present to introduce a more earnest, determined and vigorous effort on behalf of the unadulterated gospel. And so the northeast district is planning to employ an evangelist for all of his time. There is a grand opportunity in this district. A great work remains to be accomplished. The right kind of effort cannot fail to be rewarded by the highest success.

Brethren of Iowa, let us get acquainted with the great work that we have an opportunity of doing in our own state. We should not think less of the vast field that there is in heathen lands nor of the extent of the work to be done in the United States; but we should think more of what may be done in Iowa. We have in our state a population of 2,058,000. There are 4,862 churches, with a membership of 571,000. Of these about 112,000 are Roman Catholics, leaving about 450,000 for the Protestant church membership. There are over 1,000,000 people who are believers, but not communicants in any church.

At the close of 1898 our people numbered about 56,000. We had 430 congregations. Only 177 of these contributed to the work of the Iowa Christian convention. Our churches in Iowa contributed to the work of the C. W. B. M., $6,100; to the foreign work, $6,500; to the United States, $1,600, and to the work of Iowa Christian convention $1,300. There are in Iowa 15 counties in which we have no churches. There are 38 county-seats where we have no church. There are 1,500 towns and villages, about 70 of which have over 1,000 of population where we have no church.

Brethren, we have a large work to do in Iowa. Let us contribute, not less to other causes, but more to the treasury of the Iowa Christian convention, that a fitting work may be accomplished in our own state.

Jubilee City Letter.

The National Conference of Correction and Charities has been in session here for the past week, the president, Prof. C. R. Henderson, of the Sociological Department of the University of Chicago, presiding. The mornings were generally devoted to discussions of specific themes, the conference being divided into sections, the afternoon to visiting various charitable and correctional institutions and the evenings to general sessions. The speakers were for the most part persons of wide reputation and delegates were present from every part of the Union and Canada.

Governor Bushnell and Mayor Taffel extended the welcome, and Robert Treat Paine, of Boston, made the response at the opening session. Jewish rabbis, Catholic priests, Christian ministers, professors of sociology, philanthropists, in fact a most able representative delegation of people from every walk in life were in attendance and took part in the informal discussions following each paper, whether its topic was scientific or sentimental. Here all lovers of humanity united heart and hand in the one cause of human betterment. If we as a people would learn to emphasize this phase of Christian union with as great devotion as we do the doctrinal we would stand in higher favor with the brethren we seek to unify and enhance both our opportunities and efficiency.

Every form of dependency and degeneracy were considered by men or women of experience and special emphasis was laid on agencies for prevention. Among these none aroused so much enthusiasm as the kindergarten.

It was shown that 92 out of every 100 children of the city schools leave school before 14 years of age. Yet the stress of educational consideration is placed upon those eight. From those 92 come the great mass of working people, the prime producers of all wealth, the unemployed and discontented.

The manager of the National Cash Register Works, of Dayton, O., said that he advertised recently for 10 stenographers and received 2,000 applications, for one private office assistant and received 750 applications, for two pattern-makers and received two applications. This is an index to the tendency of the time toward professional and skilled vocations. The remedy proposed was the kindergarten and manual training school.

Certainly there is no superior city missionary agency for the "down-town church," and from the fact that it is slow work persuading politically partisan school boards to adopt the plan it lays upon the church as an obligation. "Train up a child the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart therefrom," is a good social as well as domestic maxim.

But the figure of towering interest among the speakers was the Golden Rule Mayor Jones, of Toledo. He spoke early in the conference on "Charity or Justice—Which?" His contention was that every man had a right to work and that if any man was accorded that right we should not only have little need of charity bureaus but make the greatest stride in social reforms ever witnessed. Mayor Jones is not a rhetorician, but has a sound heart and homely wit that makes his addresses fascinating. To hear him is to believe in him and to know him is to know a man who would "rather be right than President." He preaches the simple gospel of the Sermon on the Mount with the Golden Rule for the text, and practices it at home where he has just led an independent ticket to the most surprising success in recent political annals, receiving more votes than both the old parties combined twice over. Just now he is a terror in the hearts of the big bosses, Hanna and others. He will not accept the Republican nomination for governor unless they will allow him to make his own platform, which would utterly ruin any boss in the land. On the other hand the labor unions and mass of working people are stirring up whirlwinds of enthusiasm on behalf of Jones for governor. He has not asked for the place and will only accept of it upon his own anti-trust, anti-machine platform. A great labor mass meeting will be held in Columbus the day before the Republican state convention and of course the city will shake with cheer for the man of the Golden Rule. Hanna is having local committees appoint the delegates to the convention to prevent a stampede, and the probabilities are that Mayor Jones will be put upon an independent ticket. If so, it is the beginning of the end of Hannaism in Ohio. At another time, when space will allow, the writer shall be glad to tell something of the way this splendid Christian man practices what he preaches, and more of what he preaches.

Bethany Assembly.

The Bethany Assembly Encampment Association will hold its annual assembly meeting on the beautiful grounds of Bethany Park beginning on Thursday, July 20, and closing on Monday, August 6.

Opening day will be one of great importance. The Seventieth Indiana Regiment will hold its annual reunion that day. This is ex-President Harrison's old regiment, and it will be an occasion of very great interest.

Friday, July 21, is Childrens' Day. This has always been one of Bethany's greatest days. It is hoped that the Sunday-schools of Indiana will rally at the park this year in greater numbers than ever before.

All children under 16 years old will be admitted to the park that day FREE They will also be given a free boat ride on the lake that day.

Bro. J. W. McGarvey, of Kentucky, will deliver the lectures to the preachers. This ought to insure the attendance of every preacher in Indiana and adjoining states. His reputation as a thorough Bible scholar is nation wide; and it will be a grand opportunity for the preachers to enjoy a week's instruction from this gifted defender of the Old Book.

The State Sunday-school Association, the Y. P. S. C. E. and the C. W. B. M. will all hold their annual conventions during the assembly meetings. So that delegates to these conventions will have the advantage of attending the assembly and enjoying its exercises while attending their several conventions.

There will be days for the Ministerial Association; missionary days, temperance days, educational days, etc., etc.

Every interest of the church will be carefully considered by brethren and sisters specially interested and qualified for their work, and it is greatly desired that all departments of church work may be greatly furthered during the sittings of the assembly.

A larger number of entertainments, such as concerts, stereopticon lectures, elocutionary entertainments, etc., than ever before will be provided, so that innocent recreation may be blended with rest and spiritual enjoyment.

Bro. John L. Brandt, who attracted such large crowds of people last year to see his moving stereopticon pictures, will give a series of entertainments better, if possible, than the ones given last year. He has a much larger number of moving pictures than last year, and his entertainments will be of a very high order.

The hotels, cottages, tents, etc., will all be put in the very best of order, so that guests will be cared for in strictly first-class order. Your stay at Bethany will be made as pleasant as possible.

The silvery lake is still one of the great attractions at the park. Boating, bathing, fishing, etc., are among the attractions that the lake affords.

The mineral water from the artesian well is as free as God's sunshine. Its health-giving properties has been tested by thousands, and by the free use of this medical water you will gain in health and strength enough to pay for a trip to the assembly.

The full program and announcements will soon be published, when all will see what a rich bill of fare is being prepared for the Bethany family. Begin now to get ready to attend the assembly.

Dedication.

The new house of worship at Union Grove, near Gambier, Knox County, Ohio, will be opened for worship and formally dedicated the second Lord's day in June. The undersigned will preach and will dedicate the house. It is hoped that this may be the occasion of a general reunion of the Disciples in that section of the country. Let the brethren come up and encourage the brethren in the good work they have done in building a house for the Lord. L. L. CARPENTER.

Voted on the License Question.

To-day our city voted upon the license question.

The pastors of the Methodist, the Presbyterian, the Baptist and myself had planned and held a union meeting in the courthouse last Lord's day, at which the undersigned delivered the address, on the subject, "Strong Points for Next Tuesday," to a well-filled house. In the evening, by previous arrangement, every minister in the city preached a temperance discourse.

The temperance people have worked heroically and, notwithstanding the great sums of money furnished by the saloons and by the brewers interested in them, we have now a glorious victory. And while the bells from every steeple in the city are pealing forth the glad tidings to the people we can but open our hearts and sing praises to the living God.

Yours for good citizenship,

G. HALLECK ROWE.

Cardiff Colony.

The resident ministers, A. R. Wallace, G. P. Young. W. A. Streator, Elder Marshall (Baptist) and J. F. Callahan, of Nobles, O., were present at our meeting Sunday. J. W. Bratcher, of Waldran, preached a good discourse. Sister Wallace is doing good work in the Bible-school, which is taking on new life since warm weather came. Since last report Bro. Evens and family have settled with us. We have good cheap homes for fifty families yet. The railroad will soon be built to Waldran. We have a good church property there. Brethren are needed to occupy the homes and build up the church. For particulars write with enclosed stamp to W. A. STREATOR.

The First Meeting.

TO THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—I immersed my daughter, Mrs. Thompson, March 19, 1899, in Green River. The ground was frozen, the snow not yet all gone. Nearly everybody here assembled on the bank of the river to witness the burial and resurrection from the watery grave. Some thought I would kill my daughter, taking her into that cold and icy stream, but there was no expression of cold manifest by her, nor bad results to follow, but an expression of joy and happiness. The following first day of the week four of our family met in our house to break bread. This is the first meeting of the people called Disciples or Christians (from what I have learned) that ever assembled for that purpose in this county and the first baptism by immersion, and the first that about three-fourths of the people here ever witnessed.

Your brother in Christ,

HORATIO SCHWARTZ.

Junction, Idaho. April 8, 1889.

Attention, Disciples of Christ in Arkansas!

In a few days our annual convention will be in session. Tickets will be sold June 3-9, at one and one-third fare for the round trip. Return limit, 13th. The brethren at Hot Springs want you to come. The main things that should occupy our minds are the good things of the kingdom—the fellowship of the saints, the advancement of the church and salvation of souls; but the railroad terms give ample time, after the convention closes, to see all the places of interest about this wonderful city. We are not going for a picnic, but it is claimed, perhaps with truth, that Hot Springs is not subject to extreme heat, except as to its thermal waters. It will be a pleasant place to visit.

The convention will open Tuesday, June 6th, at 8 P. M., with a sermon by S. W. Crutcher on Our Plea. It should be heard by all. A feast of good things may be expected. The reports from Arkansas work will come Wednesday forenoon. None interested in the work should miss these reports. The C. W. B. M. will occupy the afternoon and night with a good program. Thursday morning the various interests of home work will be presented. N. M. Ragland will speak on Church Schools, or Bible Chairs. L. C. Wilson and Dr. Shibley on Church Literature, S. W. Crutcher on Home Work, T. J. Ogle on Church Extension and B. F. Clay on Ministerial Aid. The last three were selected by the corresponding secretaries of the national boards. B. F. Clay, western field secretary, will speak on Foreign Work. A. Colvin, of Beebe, will present the subject of Christian Endeavor. It will be good. Afternoon and night of Thursday, will be devoted to Arkansas work. This is the most important work of the convention. Business, zeal and sacrifice should be the motto. Everybody pray, talk, pay, for Arkansas Missions. Send your names to T. N. Kincaid, Hot Springs, Ark. No collections are expected except for state missions and ministerial aid.

WHOLESOME ADVICE

For People Whose Stomachs are Weak and Digestion Poor.

Dr. Harlandson, whose opinion in disease is worthy of attention, says when a man or woman comes to me complaining of indigestion, loss of appetite, sour stomach, belching, sour watery risings, headaches, sleeplessness, lack of ambition and a general run-down nervous condition, I advise them to take after each meal one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, allowing the tablet to dissolve in the mouth, and thus mingle with the food eaten. The result is that the food is speedily digested before it has time to sour and ferment. These tablets will digest soon anyway whether the stomach wants to or not, because they contain harmless digestive principles, vegetable essences, pepsin and Golden Seal, which supply just what the weak stomach lacks.

I have advised the tablets with great success, both in curing indigestion and to build up the tissues, increase flesh in thin nervous patients, whose real trouble was dyspepsia and as soon as the stomach was put to rights they did not know what sickness was.

A fifty-cent package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets can be bought at any drug store, and as they are not a secret patent medicine, they can be used as often as desired with full assurance that they contain nothing harmful in the slightest degree; on the contrary, any one whose stomach is at all deranged will find great benefit from the use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. They will cure any form of stomach weakness or disease except cancer of the stomach. Full size package at druggists 50 cents. Send to F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mo., for little book on stomach troubles, mailed free.

HERE is a medical lecture in a nutshell. The Kidneys drain water and impurities from the blood. The liver makes bile and helps to drive off other waste. If these organs work badly the body becomes a cesspool and disease sets in. You must get them into healthy action or die.

Dr. J. H. Mc Lean's Liver & Kidney Balm

is an old and unsurpassed remedy for Backache, Debility, Sleeplessness, Lost Appetite, Foul Tongue, Palpitations and all other symptoms of disease in those organs. It cures as well as prevents every serious trouble in Kidney, Liver or Bladder. At druggists, $1.00 per bottle.

Hiram Jubilee Endowment.

The work is progressing. Victory is sure if the preachers and friends of higher education will lend continued encouragement. We hope every preacher will call the attention of his people to the movement by special announcement from the pulpit. Every church ought to send us a list. Dear brother, preacher, friend, will you not see to it that the church of which you are a member sends in a good list of names for our great Hiram Jubilee movement? Heart to heart and hand to hand for the work of God will mean abundant success. Dear brother, send your nams at once to E.V. Zollars, Hiram, O., as a volunteer in our great Hiram Army.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Are you going to Plattsburg June 12-15? Then write Dr. C. W. Chastain, and he will see that you are assigned a good home, and the sooner you write the easier it will be for the committee doing the work and the better it will be for you. Hear?

Are you going to the Bible-school convention because of the cheap rate and the good things to be had in the way of new methods in the Master's work? Then you ought to purchase such tickets as will help us again next year. Will the ministers buy one-fare round-trips this time? You ought to thus help the brethren get these cheap rates, when it costs you just the same.

In going to Plattsburg buy one and one-third tickets over the M. K. & T. to the first junction on the Port Arthur Route, or the K.-C. P. S. & M., or the Burlington, Wabash and the Missouri Pacific, thence buy round-trip tickets at the one fare.

At Ridgeway, where A. G. Alderman is doing such acceptable work, the brethren accept their apportionment for the year ending May 31st, remitting one-half of same, just as A. G. said he would have them do, and when the preacher tells me he will see to it, the results are just sure to be helpful as the trial is made.

Cairo is another instance of this, for when McCanne or Boucher says he will see to it, we know what to expect, and this year was no exception. There are not a dozen schools in the 100 where this would fail if some one would see to it, but no plan will work itself. Will you help us before June, now that you have sidetracked us for everything else? But it is never too late to do good. Try.

At Red Top, Boone County, though the roads were against us, we had a good hearing, and better still, good co-operation, for the brethren were generous to this work, and the Halls, Huletts, Carpenters, Pollards and Powells will become more so as the opportunity is given. It is a peculiar environment, requiring patience and time.

Ten new schools were organized during the month of April, and we are trying for fifty by the convention, but they must be put in for usefulness, not show, as all the field force understands, especially where a church may arise from it.

The provisional programs are in the Missionary Magazine. The final program will be in the papers as soon as all the conferences are full, and I hope to have all in by the next issue of our papers. But the provisional will show you the good work our committee has done for us and what you may expect. Read to schools.

It is a pleasure to all to have us report all debts paid and money on hand, but unless you help us, it cannot be done. Let every school make an offering and, if possible, meet the apportionment. Brethren, you should do it for the work. H. F. DAVIS.

State Mission Notes.

Fifty thousand dollars for the dissemination of the rankest error; how much for the proclamation of the truth?

The daily press of last Monday recorded the fact that some anonymous gentleman had made a gift of $50,000 for the spread of theosophy throughout our land and it was blazoned forth as a deed worthy of the emulation and envy of a wondering world. Yet what is theosophy? Is it the veriest nonsense. It is a conglomeration of paganism and heathenism, and has a little sprinkling of the teaching of Christ, yet not enough to save the mass from being a rotten, putrid, reeking, filthy poison that vitiates the whole atmosphere and destroys its devotees in this life and that which is to come.

Yet here is one who has so fallen in love with this abominable conglomeration that he gives $50,000, not for his own blessing, but imagining that he has been blessed he wants others to share in his joy, and is willing to pour out his money like water that others may have the privilege of sharing his enjoyment. To me it is passing strange that if men do such things as this—and this is not a lone incident—that the poison shall be spread among their fellow-creatures, that the Christian world should be moved by such exhibitions to pour money into the mission treasuries of the church that the truth, the life, the joy of the gospel may be spread among the nations of the earth. Yet so often we find them begging for the means to tell them the best and sweetest story of earth, even to those of our own land and our own state. Sometime ago I asked, "Who will help" to raise $60 to keep an evangelist in one of the most destitute regions in the state? I have $50 of that with my own $10. I am looking for the last $10. Who will send it?

I am sending out now a letter to each church that has not contributed anything this year to State Missions. With that letter is some literature and a self-addressed and self-filled out postal card, only leaving space for the insertion of the amount which the church can give, and the signature of the officers. In the July magazine it is intended to publish a list of all these churches to which cards are sent, together with their answers. We must have the mind of the brotherhood on this matter. Do you want the work of State Missions to continue? We have inscribed on our banners, "MISSOURI FOR CHRIST!" This means all of it, east and west, north and south, any and every part of this great state. The city, the town, the village, the country, community, all must be won for Jesus. Is it an object worthy of us as a people? Missouri is the very heart of this nation of ours. We can make it the leading state among our brethren if we will, but in order te do this we must have the hearty co-operation of the churches.

It was a great privation to me that I could not be at the Sedalia district meeting at Lamonte. But it was a fortunate thing for the convention, for in my absence Bro. W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, went and made a speech on State Missions. It is the first time that any member of the board has been called upon for such service at a district meeting, and I am sure that the address of Bro. Richardson, who loves our cause, was so rich that he will be called upon again and again.

J. H. Allen, who now preaches at Bunceton, in Cooper county, was there and he said: "There are gray-haired men and women in Cooper county who have never heard the gospel of the Son of God." Brethren, this is in Cooper county, in the very heart of our state, and if that be true of that region, and I know it is, do you wonder at the destitution of which I speak so often in the last favored portion? It is not romance; it is sad, solemn fact. God help us to push State Missions to the front. Yours in His name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

That Cure for Anarchy.

In the May 11th issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST there appeared a short article entitled, "Our Plea and the Destruction of Anarchy," This may be considered a new use under the sun for "Our Plea," and also a new antidote for anarchy. There is some truth in the article, but the general thought I believe to be fallacious. As it seems to me there are three mistaken assumptions. The first is that anarchy is best overcome by law; the second is that the gospel is a gospel of law, and the third is that the great and fundamental characteristic of our plea is the emphasis which we place upon the sovereignty of God. Even though it should be admitted that the way to overcome anarchy is by law and not by love, shall we turn the gospel into a law, and preach it in so harsh and rigid a manner as to cure anarchy by its rigidity rather than by its love? We as a people have already preached too much law and not enough gospel, without now taking upon ourselves the additional task of curing anarchy by representing God as a great lawgiver and vidictive judge. Far too many sermons are inspired by the Old Testament story of Uzzah and the ark, and by the New Testament incident of Ananias and Sapphira; too many by the act of Paul at Paphos, and not enough by the act of Jesus in his refusal to call down fire from heaven to consume those who refused hospitality. The saying of the psalmist may apply to our day:

"Twice have I heard this:
That power belongeth unto God;
Also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy."

We hear of God's power twice to once of his mercy. If anarchy is to be cured by law, and if the law needs to be made the more harsh and unyielding by the sanction of religion, then let us preach Roman Catholicism and Calvinism, and not the primitive gospel—the gospel of love; the gospel of nonresistance!

Among the Brethren.

Geo. W. Kitchen is dividing his time this year between Bevier, Dorsey, Plain View and Greenwood, thus enabling himself to the better qualify for his work in the ministry of the Son of God, and his success now only forecasts what may be expected of him.

In the union meeting at Troy some of the ministers objected to E. G. Merrill taking the confession at the time of their coming forward of those wishing to be simply Christians, but he took it just the same. The contrast to their miserably botched-up style was too evident, hence their desire to have the confession taken when none of their converts were present.

Jno. T. Owens, Maryville, Mo., will give all his time this year to Bolckow, Elmo and Brush Creek in Platte, and those knowing Brother Owens predict a successful year for those churches.

It will be good news to the many friends o W. F. Wood, Bolckow, Mo., to know that he is becoming himself again after the long siege of sickness. Brother Wood is one of the faithful in the Lord's work.

S. R. Reynolds will locate with the Clearmont church, giving them half time, and will more than likely give the other half to Rosendale.

One of the best meetings, all things considered, of the winter is now being held by T. W. Cottingham at Rosendale. The roads were not only impassable, but the streets of the town for days were so, and yet the meeting has gone on without a break and with thirty-five additions. T. W. will likely report over 500 added in the Nodaway district this year.

Jno. P. Jesse and his happy wife will soon be making garden for themselves, having a delightful home near Gower with over an acre of ground in which John is expected to work off his surplus. But he says it is only his at so much per month, and at that by the month, too.

Jas. E. Davis, while prosecuting his studies at Albany, Mo., in Central Christian College, is giving half time to the work at Wilcox.

Every member of the Central Christian College, Albany, Mo., is doing more or less acceptable work for the churches near to Albany. Pres. Z. Moore is preaching every Lord's day for the Albany brethren, while O. B. Sears is giving part time to the church at Perrin, while Professors Alderman and McKensie are filling the pulpits at Ridgeway and Mitchell Park, St. Joseph. It speaks well for the school to have such an army of Christian men associated in the education of young men and women.

C. A. Burridge, another one of the college students, is giving part of his time to the church at Mt. Zion, Gentry County, Mo.

J. D. McClure, Albany, Mo., is never idle in the Master's work, and is this year helping the brethren at Bethany, Clinton County, Mo.

Levi Marshall with all his busy life as pastor of the Hannibal (Mo.) church is not satisfied, and now begins a meeting with the Union Church people on the South Side, and good will grow from such efforts for Christ.

E. S. Oatman, another one of the Central College students, is giving his time to the churches in Harrison County, and is doing them good work.

Children's Day, Sunday, June 4th.

We ask the preachers and church officers to co-operate with the Sunday-school superintendents in making Children's Day for Heathen Missions, the first Sunday in June, a notable day in our history.

Great care should be taken to secure a large offering. The following suggestions may be helpful:

1. Gather up all the Missionary Pockets by classes. Let each teacher report the amount from his or her class gathered in the Missionary Pockets or otherwise. The teachers should also state the number in the class entitled to membership in the One Dollar League. The names should be given to the superintendent or secretary and sent to this office that the beautiful Souvenir Button may be sent to all who have given or raised $1 or more. Sometimes children work hard to raise $1 and then their names are never sent in. It is hoped that each teacher will give at least $1 in the Children's Day offering. Some teachers will give $5 or $10, or even more.

2. After the offering has been taken by classes, all the visitors and friends present should be asked to contribute.

3. If the exercise is rendered at night, an offering should be taken and added to the morning offering. The friends present will cheerfully contribute if given an opportunity.

4. Start in Sunday morning with the determination to reach at least your full apportionment.

5. Let the claims and importance of the work stand out clearly. Remember the Foreign Society is doing work in India, China, Japan, Turkey, Scandinavia, England, Africa, and will begin work soon in Cuba and the Philippine Islands, if the receipts are large enough.

6. State that the Sunday-schools are asked for $40,000 this year, and that if they give this amount we are reasonably certain to reach the $150,000. Encourage the children by telling them that they have given nearly $300,000 since Children's Day was inaugurated in 1881.

7. From the first make all feel that this is a great work, that they are helping to send the gospel and all the blessings of our Christian homes to millions sitting in the midnight darkness of the heathen world. Try to make all feel that sending out the Word of life to those who know it not is our first duty. In all the exercises of the day seek to please Christ.

8. Let the contents of the Birthday Box be added to the Children's Day offering. Do not depend upon what is in the Birthday Box. Work as hard for a generous offering as though you did not have the Birthday Box.

It should be borne in mind that many children and others will be present who will carry the memory of it through their lives. It is important, therefore, to make it as successful as possible.

We ask every Sunday-school in the whole land to join in this Children's Day offering. If you have not ordered Children's Day supplies, we urge you to take an offering, the best that can be secured, anyway.

Send the offering promptly Monday morning, June 5th, to F. M. Rains, treasurer, Box 884, Cincinnati, O. Be careful to give the local name of the Sunday-school when different from the post office. Please work hard for a great offering.

HIRES
IS A
Temperance Drink

It is prepared for temperance people, a multitude of whom believe it helpful to the great cause of temperance. Any one who states that HIRES Rootbeer is not a temperance drink, either willfully misrepresents the facts or has not investigated the subject in an impartial manner. HIRES Rootbeer is a temperance drink. The leading chemists say so without qualification, and stand ready to prove their assertion. If there are any fair-minded persons anywhere who have a scrupulous doubt as to the honesty of this claim, and will address THE CHARLES E. HIRES COMPANY, Philadelphia, they will be given every opportunity to satisfy themselves as to the ingredients, the nature, the character of HIRES Rootbeer.

Railroad Rates to Plattsburg.

Once more and for the last time let me call attention to railroad rates to the convention. The Port Arthur System, Santa Fe, Rock Island, Missouri Pacific, Fort Scott and Memphis, Wabash, Burlington and the Friscoe have each granted a rate of one fare for the round trip from all Missouri points. The C. & A. has made no rate as yet. The M. K. & T. will sell round-trip tickets for one fare and a third from all stations in Missouri to all junction points with the one-fare roads. See your ticket agent at once, and find out if he has instructions. I have been unable to secure the special train from Cameron to Plattsburg Monday evening, and you must govern yourselves accordingly. If all preachers will use the round-trip tickets in the place of their half-fare permits, it will help very much in the future. This is a splendid rate, and all ought to go.

Abilene, May 26.—We are in a good meeting here with D. D. Boyle evangelist. Four additions in the opening. Hope for a big meeting. Bro. Boyle is a power against sin everywhere. At the close of our meeting at Carneiro, J. R. Sauers, of Abilene, was located as pastor. At his last appointment there he baptized five and received two others into the church. Bro. Sauers is a strong gospel preacher and we are glad that Abilene can send out such a man.—H. V. SCHOLES.

Hoisington, May 27.—Four baptized at regular service last Sunday evening by the pastor, J. N. McConnell, and two from the Baptists. Bro. McConnell was re-elected without a dissenting voice to serve the church another year beginning June 1.—A. H. BAKER.

Singing by the Way.

Ho, comrades, heavenward-faring,
Let's sing in cheerful strain
A song to lighten labor,
And soothe the heart of pain,
A song of God's own gladness
So full of help and cheer,
That weary wayside pilgrims
Will gain new strength to hear.

Life holds for most, my comrades,
More happiness than pain.
God gives a day of sunshine
For every hour of rain.
So, trusting in the wisdom
Of his eternal plan,
Let's face the rain or sunshine,
And do the best we can.

Oh, let us sing, my comrades,
Of blessings by the way;
The gleams of light that brighten
The lowering skies of gray;
And as we sing about them,
The shadows break apart,
And all the world's in sunshine,
Because we're light of heart.

THE EVOLUTION OF A PASTOR;

Or, Elder Brune's Experiences at Eastville.

BY A. A. HONEYWELL.

CHAPTER VI.

That evening the elders came at the appointed hour and no time was lost by discussing various topics foreign to the purpose of their meeting, but Bibles were immediately opened and the study of the preceding evening was resumed.

Elder Brune.—We saw last evening that elders were "appointed" in every church. By turning to 1 Peter 5:1 you will see that Peter also was an elder: "The elders which are among you I exhort; who am also an elder and a witness of the suffering of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed."

Bro. Brown.—I read that also this afternoon. I had a little leisure time and I put it in with my Bible. John calls himself an elder in 3 John 1: "The elder unto the well beloved Gaius, whom I love in the truth."

Bro. Olds.—I never knew that before, but I was reading Paul's letter to Titus and discovered that Titus as well as the apostle ordained elders. I refer to Titus 1:5: "For this cause I left thee in Crete that thou shouldst set in order the things that are wanting and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee."

Elder Brune.—That brings us to the kind of men who were to be "ordained" or "appointed" elders. Continue to read the next few verses, Bro. Olds.

Bro. Olds.—"If any be blameless, the husband of one wife, having faithful children, not accused of riot or unruly. For a bishop must be blameless as the steward of God; not self-willed, not soon angry, not given to wine, no striker, not given to filthy lucre; but a lover of hospitality, a lover of good men, sober, just, holy, temperate; holding fast the faithful Word as he hath been taught, that he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers."

Elder Brune.—Before commenting upon this let us turn to 1 Tim. 3:1-7 and read again the qualifications of an elder or bishop, for the two titles have reference to the same office. Bro. Brown, will you read?

Bro. Brown.—"This is a true saying. If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work. A bishop, then, must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour. Given to hospitality, apt to teach, not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre, but patient; not a brawler, not covetous. One that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity. (For if a man knoweth not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?) Not a novice, lest being puffed up with pride he fall into condemnation of the devil. Moreover, he must have a good report of them which are without, lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil."

Elder Brune.—This is quite a rigid examination that an elder has to pass, is it not?

Bro. Olds.—Yes, indeed! I am sure I cannot pass it. In fact, I feel as if I was out of place as an elder.

Bro. Brown.—We all feel that way. We cannot come up to the ideal, but we can come as near to it as possible for us.

Elder Brune.—Let us enumerate what an elder or bishop should be, so as to charge our minds more fully with these requirements.

A bishop is not to be given to wine, a striker, greedy of fifthy lucre, a brawler, covetous, a novice, self-willed, soon angry.

A bishop is to be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, of good behavior, hospitable, apt to teach, patient, ruling well his own house, of good report, a lover of good men, sober, just, holy, temperate, sound in doctrine.

This is a long list of evils to be absent and a longer list of virtues to be present. Surely, Paul speaks truly when he says, "If a man desire the office of a bishop he desireth a good work;" for in undertaking the office of a bishop he undertakes to shun all these virtues. Am I not right Bro. Brown?

Bro. Brown.—Yes—I think so—although I had never thought of it in just that way. I had always considered that the church should select those who came nearest to having the scriptural requirements, but had not thought that a person in accepting the office thereby agreed to acquire whatever was lacking, but I see now that he does and it makes me feel a personal responsibility to look to myself and my life that I have never felt before.

Bro. Olds.—I am like Bro. Brown. I had never thought that an elder's duty was to "rule" himself so much as to look after the spiritual interests of others, but I now see he should examine himself quite as much as others.

Elder Brune.—True. The office of a bishop is a high and holy one and God desires holy men to fill that office, in order that his cause may not come into reproach. Are there any other passages of Scripture to which you wish to refer?

Bro. Brown.—James 5:14 reads: "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." I see in this that the elders are to visit the sick and pray for and with them to the end that the Lord will save the sick. Also Tim. 5:1: "Rebuke not an elder, but entreat him as a father;" also the 17th, 18th and 19th verses: "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honor, especially those who labor in Word and doctrine. For the Scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. And, The laborer is worthy of his reward. Against an elder receive not an accusation but before two or three witnesses." Here we have a statement that double honor is due those elders who rule well, which to my mind is conclusive evidence that the elders are to "rule."

Elder Brune.—I will have something to say on that Scripture later, but I desire to get all the references that we desire to use before us first and then in the light of them all to draw our conclusions. I also have a few references to which I desire to call attention. 1 Cor. 9:14: "Even so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the gospel shall live of the gospel." Gal. 6:6: "Let him who is taught in the Word communicate to him that teacheth in all good things." Eph. 4:11: "And he gave some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors, and teachers." 2 Tim. 4:5: "Do the work of an evangelist." Acts 21:8: "And we entered unto the house of Philip the evangelists, which was one of the seven." Jeremiah 3:15: "And I will give you pastors acoording to my own heart, which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding." 1 Pet. 5:1-4: "The elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an elder and a witness of the suffering of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed. Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint but willingly, not for filthy lucre but of a ready mind. Neither as being Lords over God's heritage, but being examples to the flock." There are many other references to which we might call attention which have more or less to do with the work of an elder, but these are, perhaps, the plainest and most important.

Having read these Scriptures, let us make our deductions and arrive at our conclusions. I will enumerate until you find something to which you take exception or wish to offer something additional. We find:—

1. That elders under the Jewish economy were political rather than religious officers, notably magistrates to settle questions in dispute, etc.

2. That thirteen or fourteen years after Pentecost there were elders at Jerusalem (Acts 11:30).

3. Paul appointed elders in every church (Acts 14:23).

4. He left Titus in Crete to set things in order and ordain elders in every church (Titus 1:5).

Bro. Olds.—5th. That there were more than one elder in each church.

Elder Brune.—Quite true. A plurality of elders is the scriptural plan.

6. That elders and bishops are the same (1 Tim. 3:1; 1 Tim. 5:17).

7. That elders and overseers are the the same (Acts 20:28).

8. That the office of pastor is of divine appointment (Jer. 3:15; Eph. 4:11).

9. That both pastors and elders are to feed the flock (Jer. 3:15; 1 Pet. 5:2).

10. That elders were appointed by the apostles or their associates, as Timothy and Titus (Acts 14:23).

11. That the elders at Jerusalem joined with the apostles in signing decrees (Acts 15:22-29).

12. That elders or bishops were to be of exemplary character (1 Tim. 3:1-7).

13. That elders were to be "apt to teach."

14. That elders were to "feed the flock" (1 Pet. 5:2).

15. Elders are to visit the sick (James 5:14).

16. Some elders were to "labor in Word and doctrine (1 Tim. 5:17).

17. Those elders who rule well and "labor in Word and doctrine also" are to receive compensation (1 Tim. 5:18; 1 Cor. 9:14; Gal. 6:6).

18. These elders are worthy of double and special honor (1 Tim. 5:17).

Have I made any false or questionable deductions so far, Bro. Brown?

Bro. Brown.—No. I think not.

Elder Brune.—Then I will continue.

19. No accusation was to be received against an elder except there were two witnesses to prove it (1 Tim. 5:19).

20. That elders were men in authority.

Bro. Brown.—That is the point exactly which we have claimed from the beginning.

Elder Brune.—I have never denied that they had authority, but have differed with you as to what kind of authority they possessed.

21. They were not to take the oversight of the flocks as being lords over God's heritage.

22. Their leading was to be that of example. The authority, then, after all, was not of "Thou shalt" and "Thou shalt not," but of example. By going before in all good works and holy living and persuading others to follow. Can you find any other kind of authority which they are to exercise?

Bro. Brown.—I don't see very much authority in that. Any one can exercise that kind of authority.

Elder Brune.—Exactly. Peter says, "Yea all of you be subject one to another and be clothed in all humility." Yet, while this is true, the younger are admonished to pay deference to the elders and heed their admonitions and "submit themselves to the elders."

The idea of authority in an arbitrary and dictatorial sense has no place in the Christian system. "Love [not authority] is the fulfilling of the law."

23. There are two classes of elders.

Bro. Brown.—What is that?

Elder Brune.—Two classes of elders, or rather a division of work. The word "especially" in 1 Tim. 5:17 means, if it means anything, that part of the elders labored in "Word and doctrine" and part did not. Yet all were "ruling elders" and worthy of double honor. Is that not true Bro. Brown?

Bro. Brown.—What if it does? How does that help your case? You are not an elder of any kind.

Elder Brune.—Bro. Brown, I want to ask you a few pointed questions. Are all of these elders ruling elders?

Bro. Brown.—Yes.

Elder Brune.—Did all labor in word and doctrine?

Bro. Brown.—No.

Elder Brune.—Was special honor to be given to those who did thus labor?

Bro. Brown.—It says so here.

Elder Brune.—Were those thus laboring to receive pay?

Bro. Brown.—I think so.

Elder Brune.—Do you receive pay?

THE SINGER MANUFACTURING CO.
OFFICES ALL OVER THE WORLD.

Bro. Brown.—No. I pay to the church, but get no money from the church. The receiving is the other way.

Elder Brune.—Do you think you should?

Bro. Brown.—No. I am making no complaint.

Elder Brune.—Do you labor in Word and doctrine?

Bro. Brown.—I do what I can, but my business keeps me very busy six days in the week.

Elder Brune.—But do you LABOR? You know what labor mean. It means to devote your time and effort to a certain object. Labor means work, not recreation. Do you LABOR in Word and doctrine?

Bro. Brown.—I guess I can't say I do.

Elder Brune.—Then are you an elder such as Paul speaks of when he says "especially those who labor in Word and doctrine?"

Bro. Brown.—Well—hem—I guess—I don't exactly meet that description.

Elder Brune.—Do I labor in Word and doctrine?

Bro. Brown.—Well—yes—we hire you to do that work.

Elder Brune.—Do I get pay for it? Do I get the reward of labor?

Bro. Brown.—I think you do, and pretty good pay for these dull times.

Elder Brune.—Then, Bro. Brown, do I meet the scriptural requirements of those elders who "labor in Word and doctrine?"

Bro. Brown.—I don't—hem—Bro. Olds you don't seem to have have much to say. What do you think about it?

Bro. Olds.—I am hardly prepared to answer. We might let that question rest.

Bro. Brown.—Yes! yes! We'll let that question rest. That is the proper course.

Elder Brune.—Then let me ask a few more questions on a different point. What is a pastor?

Bro. Brown.—A spiritual shepherd, I think.

Elder Brune.—Very good. What does he do?

Bro. Brown.—Feeds the flock, acquires a personal acquaintance with the flock, visits them, comforts them and exhorts them to Christian living.

Elder Brune.—Do you do that?

Bro. Brown.—How con I? You expect too much of us? We are busy men.

Elder Brune.—I was simply asking for information. Not to criticize.

Bro. Brown.—Then, no. Not to any great extent.

Elder Brune.—Are you then a scriptural pastor?

Bro. Brown.—I can hardly say we are.

Elder Brune.—Am I?

Bro. Brown.—I guess you do some pastoral work, but—hem—we'll let that pass for the present also.

Elder Brune.—Am I an evangelist?

Bro. Brown.—Yes; we always said you were.

Elder Brune.—But I am not an elder.

Bro. Brown.—We think not.

Elder Brune.—Elders are to visit the sick. Who does that?

Bro. Brown.—You do, mostly.

Elder Brune.—Elders are to teach. Who does that?

Bro. Brown.—We, some; but you more, perhaps.

Elder Brune.—Elders are to feed the flock. You have already said I did that. Are you, then, a scriptural elder. You do not labor in Word and doctrine, do not visit the sick and do not teach extensively, etc., etc.

Bro. Brown.—I was chosen elder by the church, and furthermore we have already agreed that only part of the elders did that kind of work.

Elder Brune.—True. But what part of the eldership of this church does that work? That is the question.

Bro. Brown.—I think your questions are altogether too pointed and personal.

Elder Brune.—I believe this subject is a personal one, especially in its application. Is it not?

Bro. Brown.—Yes; I guess it is. But the church selected us.

Elder Brune.—Who selected me?

Bro. Brown.—The church, of course.

Elder Brune.—Then we are equal on that point. Then leave out the question of office, excepting that of evangelist. You say I am an evangelist. Do I do the work of a pastor?

Bro. Brown.—I admit you do.

Elder Brune.—Do I do the work of those elders who labor in Word and doctrine?

Bro. Brown.—I have said you did.

Elder Brune.—Are such elders worthy of special honor?

Bro. Brown.—Yes.

Elder Brune.—Then, brethren, if I do the work of evangelist, pastor and elder, and you only an elder and admitedly of those not given this special honor, why is it you appropriate all the honor and authority to yourself and make me your servant, one not even worthy to advise with? Why do you lord it over me? Am I not your equal, scripturally? I certainly am. Am I not an elder? I am, indeed. The Scriptures make me such, and if you and the church do not recognize that fact, I am nevertheless an elder still. No action of man, men, or body of men, can change God's work. Brethren, excuse my earnestness in speaking of this matter. I cannot help it. My body has for four months submitted to your dictations, but my spirit has soared above them and nestled close to the only Master, where alone it has found comfort and satisfaction. I have shown you clearly what the Scriptures teach, and my self-respect and sense of duty will not permit me to longer occupy a position so foreign to the scriptural teaching and spirit of Christianity. Unless I can continue with you as an equal—a co-laborer with you—I cannot longer remain.

As Elder Brune gave vent to his pent-up feelings in this impassionate speech, Bro. Brown and Bro. Olds were visibly affected. Tears trickled down their cheeks, and with trembling voice Bro. Brown said: "Bro. Brune, it may be we have made a mistake, and have treated you wrongly. God forgive us, if we have."

"Amen!" responded Bro. Olds.

"I do not think," continued Bro. Brown, "it is best to continue this study longer. We have gone over the subject quite thoroughly, and I wish time to meditate over it; so I think we had better be going."

"Yes, I think we had better be going," added Bro. Olds. "My mind is somewhat confused, and I wish the quietude of my own home to enable me to form a definite conclusion."

Thus they parted for the evening, leaving the question still unsettled, but it did not long remain so; for before Bro. Brown's head touched his pillow he had settled the matter once for all in the light of Holy Writ. The same was true of Bro. Olds.

A Tribe of Heathen with a Sense of Humor.

The Druses are a most admirable people; they are extremely hospitable, ivaraiably refusing money for the services they may render a traveler, and they are always fond of a joke. They are about the only people in Syria with any comprehension of humor. Living in the territory of the Turk, they pay neither tribute nor respect to him, and the Turk, up to date, has been quite unable to bring them under the yoke of the empire.

I had my first sight of the Druses in Beyrout, and took them for important officials from the way they swaggered around the town and from the fact that each had a gun slung around his shoulder, for the Turks allow no one but themselves to carry arms. They pretend not to see the armed Druses, and the latter do not seem particularly to care whether they attract the attention of the Turks or not. If any foreigner enters Turkey with even the harmless, necessary revolver, it is taken from him and confiscated.

A man we met in Damascus succeeded in getting his revolver and a number of cartridges through, but that was by taking the inner works of a kodak out and placing in the box his pistol, surrounded by the cartridges. The Turks are so accustomed to kodaks that they allowed him to pass without question. The Druses, however, do not ask the permission of the Turks to carry their guns, and the Turks keep mum.

About 65,000 Druses inhabit the Mountains of Lebanon, and some 10,000 more are found in the Hauran district beyond Damascus. There, too, is located the tribe of Maronites, a large community, which numbers, all told, something like 135,000. Like the Druses, the Maronites occupy the country on both sides of Damascus, largely inhabiting the Mountains of Lebanon. The Turks promised the Druses the lands of the Maronites, and promised the Maronites the lands of the Druses. They also stirred up ancient enmities between the two peoples, fearing that they would unite and sweep Turkish rule from Syria.

The Maronites being largely in excess of the Druses in numbers, the Turks succeeded in persuading them to disarm, and then joined the Druses in attacking them. Naturally the disarmed people suffered heavily. Peace was patched up between the two tribes in the early sixties, but various writers inform us that the ancient enmity between the Druses and the Maronites has continued.

I did not find this to be the case. Our dragoman was a Maronite, and he certainly stood high in the esteem of the Druses. By what I could learn from the latter, they are now "on to" the game of the Turk, and the Sultan has moved his thimble-rigging performances farther west, and is playing his little dodge with great success on those simpletons—Russia, England, France and Italy.

Much happens in the Lebanon Mountains that does not get into the papers. A while ago the Turks sent an expedition from Beyout against the Druses, who were becoming too independent to be bearable. The Turkish battalion disappeared into the valleys of Lebanon, and for some days there was considerable anxiety concerning them. But at last there appeared at Beyout a tattered Druse, badly cut up, who said his people had been defeated after a terrible battle, and that the two enemies now occupied positions opposing each ether, neither daring to attack.

Seeing that the Druses could not withstand the might of the Turkish Empire, he had deserted his comrades and had come to swear allegiance to the Turk. As a matter of good faith, knowing all the paths of the mountains, he had brought a message from the leader of the Turkish expedition, who asked the commander at Beyout to send him reinforcements instantly, which this Druse would guide to the place where they were most needed.

Another band of soldiers were at once dispatched under the guidance of the traitorous Druse. He led them into the mazes of the mountains and up a high valley, where he triumphantly pointed out to them the Turkish flag waving over a large body of men in Turkish uniform. Suddenly the guiding Druse disappeared into the wilderness, and from all around fire blazed forth on the unfortunate Turks who thus, too late, realized that they had been trapped.

The Druses had taken in the the first expedition and wiped it off the face of the earth, not a man escaping. Being still unsatisfied, now that their fighting blood was up, they had calmly ordered on another regiment, which they also decimated, just as a hungry man would call for a second helping at a restaurant.

After this double victory the Druses thought of going down to Beyrout itself, to make things interesting and lively in that village; and it was not fear of the forces they would meet that hindered them, but the fact that so many foreigners lived at Beyrout, some of whom who would be sure to get hurt and thus bring on outside intervention. This was the case when Napoleon the Third sent 10,000 soldiers to French soldiers to keep the peace in Lebanon, about thirty-eight years ago. They, however, forwarded a polite letter to the Turkish commander at Beyrout, requesting him to send larger men next time, as the Turkish uniforms they had captured were of too small a size. Thus it comes that, although the rich people of Beyrout go up tothe Mountains of Lebanon in the summer for their health, Turkish officers have come to the conclusion that the mountains are not a suitable health resort for their soldiers.

A missionary who had spent many years among the Druses gave me some interesting particulars about their religion and habits. He says that they are the most difficult people to live among in an evangelical way that he ever had any experience with. They will agree cordially with everything a missionary says, they will join with him in prayer and do everything he wishes, but they stick to their own religion just the same. The faithful are enjoined to conform to whatever religion is dominant around them, but to remain true in their hearts to their own.

Thus they will worship quite complacently in a Mohammedan mosque or a Christian church. They never pray, as they look upon prayer as an impertinence toward the Almighty. They believe in one passionless god who is all-wise and therefore needs no advice from this earth. They will allow Mohammedans or Christians to enter their churches, but when a Mohammedan visits them they cease their own form of worship and begin reading the Koran. When a Christian comes, they read the Bible.

They do not practice polygamy, but treat women with a respect similar to that of civilized nations, teaching them to read and write—something which every Druse woman is able to do—thus forming a striking contrast to their Moslem neighbors. They have seven commandments, the first and greatest of which inculcates absolute truth; but that is only between Druse and Druse, for they may lie as much as they like to the outsider; it is not counted against them.

They make no attempt to proselyte other people, for they know it would be useless, as the gates of heaven were finally closed something like 800 years ago. They believe in one indivisible God, but they have had ten Christs, the last being Hakim, whose full name is ElHakim bi-amriillah Aboo 'Alee Mansoor, who held the gates of heaven open for thirty-six years, during which time all mankind had a chance of salvation. The gates were at last closed in the year 1020. It seems rather illogical of the Druses to shut out from Paradise everybody born since that time. They say that no more Christs will appear, and that when Hakim finally returns it will be to conquer the world.

Hakim, by the way, who was Caliph of Egypt, seems to have been the worst and most tyrannical ruler that ever reigned in that much misgoverned country. He became so unbearable at last that his sister arranged for his assassination, which duly came off, to the satisfaction of all the people of Egypt and the surrounding countries.—From "Travels and Troubles in the Orient," by Robert Barr, in Saturday Evening Post.

Etiquette for Children.

It seems to me that too many mothers neglect this important element in the training of their children. In fact, do young folks at any time have the manners that distinguish those of two generations ago? There has been a sad decadence of manners generally within the last forty years, and, unfortunately, children have been affected by it more visibly than any others. Gone is the old-time courtesy which children showed to their elders.

And yet we cannot blame the children. The fault lies with their parents, principally their mothers. We cannot expect all little children, indeed, to be Little Lord Fauntleroys, or Eva St. Clairs, but they can be thoughtful of others, unselfish, respectful and courteous. Especially should they know how to behave politely in the dining room. If there is one thing more than another that shows our bringing up, as we say, it is our manners at table and the way we eat. Yet how often is one's whole meal made unpleasant by some unruly or misbehaved child. Mothers cannot be oblivious to the misdemeanors of their children in this respect. Possibly, however, they may not realize that the responsibility of their behavior or misbehavior rests upon them. But it is as necessary to teach them good manners as that they must not eat too much.

In the first place, are not children overpetted and allowed too many privileges in these days? The good old maxim of our grandmother's time, "Children should be seen and not heard," is entirely obsolete, at least in practice. In many homes the children are the real managers. They monopolize the conversation and continually interrupt older ones while talking. This is all wrong. Such a mode, or rather lack of training, fosters their selfishness and vanity, and renders them real nuisances of fault-finding and discourtesy.

Children should be taught to be quiet when in the presence of guests or those older than themselves. Only the other day I was greatly shocked while visiting at a friend's house by the ill manners of her little boy, who was not quite ten years old. Before we were all fairly seated at the table he leaned forward upon the table, knife and fork in hand, and exclaimed: "I want some of the plum pudding, but I won't have any cake."

"You must wait, Carl," said the father, sternly. Afterward he was helped three times to plum pudding, though several of the older ones had a much smaller amount in consequence. I imagined that his mother might feel ashamed of his want of good breeding, but the little fellow afterward remarked to me confidentially, "Mamma always says I may have the lion's share of anything."

Ought children to grow up without being instructed in the rudiments of good manners? Perhaps some overburdened mother says she cannot always take time to see to these little matters of dress and behavior; but she can take time to teach even the little ones to do it for themselves, and it will soon become second nature. The laws of cleanliness and propriety to be always observed, and something of the etiquette of the best table usages, can very easily be added. It is an essential part of a child's education to learn how to behave, and if they have good manners at the table, nine times out of ten they will elsewhere.

A faultless toilet, quietness of demeanor, and a willingness to wait for others, the use of the fork instead of the knife in conveying food to the mouth, the absence of fault-finding, the proper use of the napkin, eating and drinking without making any uncouth noise—these are to be equally observed as a part of table etiquette, and the youngest boy or girl can easily practice them. Nor should they forget the "please" and "thank you," that have so much to do toward making children attractive.—Illustrated Christian Weekly.

Vacation Days.

There are a great many people who don't know what to do with a vacation when they get one. They walk around in their Sunday clothes or perspire at political picnics, or sit out the time on the piazza of a summer resort. When they get so tired they can't do any more, they take a rest and call that "a vacation." But the truth is that you must work just as hard to get the good out of a vacation as you must to improve the working time. Children understand this. They are much more exhausted at the end of Saturday than they are at the close of Friday. But it's been more fun; lots. I would rather tire myself out hunting four-leaf clover than in looking for sparrowgrass for greens. When you have a vacation, you don't want to do anything that is useful. I can't give all the children have written about their vacations, but here is enough to make you long:

Mattie Lorena Upton, Houstonia Mo.: "My mother and I made a visit to my uncle's family, who live seven miles from Independence. We came to a place over the river where the bridge had been washed out; we had to walk through the train, get off, and walk around to another train. My uncle met us at Independence; we rode out home with him. They had the dinner ready for us. When we had spoken to every one, we sat down and ate heartily. We had a delightful time wading in the water, and horseback riding. My cousins and I had a playhouse down at the spring. We sold cakes, lightbread and butter, and mud pies." Emily Riley, Kearney, Mo.: "My best vacation days were spent in the country. My mother went to Colorado Springs and I stayed with my aunt. Every day I would ride horseback after the cows, or go flower hunting. I stayed five weeks. My Christmas vacation was spent in Texas. I have read Three Vassar Girls in South America; I am now reading Three Vassar Girs in the Rhine. My best quotation is from Cervantes: 'Every one is as God made him, and oftimes a great deal worse.' "

Fred Evans, Brooks, Ia.: "Once, Cousin Roy and I went after the cattle. We found a blackhaw tree. So Roy and I climed up to the forks of the tree. We got tired sitting up there, so we got to moving around; and the first I knew anything, Roy fell, but his foot caught fast in the forks, and his head hanging down. So I pushed his foot loose and he fell on his head, and next I fell, and the biggest limb came with me; and all the laughing you ever heard was there!" Lola Cox, Cox, Mo.: "New Year's week my aunt and little cousin were here. We went over to my uncle's across Salt River, and I stayed all week, with my least sister. We went to an oyster supper."

Eunice M. Shafer, Nilwood, Ill.: "The best time I had was last summer. July 19th was my birthday. Mamma gave me a party. There were eleven little girls, and they brought me so many nice presents. Some brought me handkerchiefs and some brought silk ones. . . We went down to the branch and played on the sand in the shade. Then we came back to the yard and swung in the hammock. At four Mamma called us to supper; we had ice cream, cake and cream soda. After supper we all went to the rock quarry and watched the water flow over the rocks. At six the little girls all went home. We had a nice time. I don't think I will ever forget it. I only have one objection to your costinued story; and that is that every week there isn't enough of it."

Charlie Mountain, West Liberty, Ia.: "My two brothers, my cousin, a neighbor boy and I went to the river to stay all night. The owls hooted so that a person could hardly sleep. We heard a rooster crow about three o'clock in the morning. It was oo cold to do without a fire; we built one out of an old tree that had been blown down. We only caught one fish—that wasn't fair, was it? One or the other would be pulling the covers off all night, or running after logs to keep the fire up. We had more fun than we had sleep. We got up at four o'clock in the morning to look at our hooks. We may go fishing again this summer. I wish you would come and go with us. Miss Violet Star and her class got their pictures taken; I was one of them." (I now have three pictures of our members; the last was from Mamie C. Davis (10), Hume, Ill. It pleases me very much when the children think enough of me to send their pictures. But I am not hinting for Miss Violet's. I would like very much to fish with Charlie next summer. In fancy I can see those five boys rising in the dusky morning with disheveled hair, and creeping to the river's brink to draw up their lines cautiously. And I know how they felt when they saw the wet hooks glistening in the light of the camp fire, perhaps a wisp of mouldy hay or a snakey-looking snag hanging upon one, and that one poor, friendless fish—a very small one I am afraid. But when I camp out upon the river I enjoy it just as much if I do not get a bite. The washing of the water, and the strange, dark things the woods are always saying, and the solemn anthems of the frogs, and the shine of the fire, and nobody near to tell me "not to play in the water—all this makes the hours paint the time in golden hues."

Mamie C. Davis: "In our five school examinations I rank first every time but once. One day my little brother (3) went out in the yard and threw up a piece of coal. Not seeing it fall, he ran in the house and cried, 'O, mamma, I threw up a piece of coal, and Goud God caught it.' " Mrs. Sallie Davis, Hume, Ill.: "I have followed the Advance Society directions in full, and have gained a great deal by it; considering a family of six small children, and my eyes being very weak at times, I have done what I could. God bless you all." (Children, that means you, too. I wish the people who keep saying they "haven't got time to read or study" would note the preceding. I know from experience that when your eyes are not strong, you are tempted to slight history; and if I had six children I don't know what I would do.)

Bertha N. Beesley: "I am very sorry to write this letter, for I have broken the rules of the Advance Society. I went to the singing on Saturday night and was very sleepy when I came home, so I forgot to read my verse in the Bible. I think our badges ought to be red, white and blue instead of red and yellow. We Americans don't like Spanish colors. Three months from now I hope to be on the honor list." (Don't you think she ought to be excused for forgetting just one time? I do. As to the colors of the badge, the ribbon must be red, with "Av. S." worked on it in black letters before you become an Honor List member. After keeping the five rules for three months, you can work "Av. S." on the red ribbon in any colors you please. If you are too patriotic to use old gold, you could have blue, or green, or white, or white-and-blue.)

You know, when a person makes a great success, or accomplishes a victory, he is said to win his Waterloo. That is because five or six different great nations managed to defeat one man at a certain Waterloo. Well, there is a town named Waterloo in Iowa, where a battle is going on for good literature. Mabel Gunther started it, and she has enlisted these soldiers in her regiment of the Advance Society: Ethel and Nora Iles (12 and 10), Alice M. Hammett (12), Blanche Parker (12), Lena Walrath (11) and Lily Dietz (the last named is president, Lena is vice-president and Mabel is secretary). Ella Cash: "My sister, Mabel, and I have always read the Bible every morning after breakfast, since we were ten years old. I send my best regards to all the members."

Mabel Gunther: "The best fun I had last summer was on the farm; I stayed three days, and learned to ride horseback, which I enjoyed very much. Every evening about six, we went riding. We were near the river, so we spent much time in boating and wading. One afternoon we went out in the woods after wild grapes, and got two or three baskets full. My pet this summer is a pony; last week papa got a surrey for sister and me. I hope Mr. Weston will adopt Delight and put her in school. I am reading 'The Satello Boys.' "

HONOR LIST: Elmer C. Rinehart, Ridgeway, Mo.; Mabel and Gertrude Minnick, Davenport, Wis.; D. M. Shafer, Decatur, Tex., Mabel and Ella Cash, Litchfield, Ill.; Charlie Mountain, Emiley Riley, Fred Evans, Julia and Lola Cox, Mamie C. Davis and her mother, Mrs. Sallie Davis. Next week, that continued story.

THE CROSS OF CHRIST.*

The cross of Christ is the golden milestone from which the history of redemption measures its consummations and its beginnings. With it the preliminary and partial ministry of salvation wrought by Judaism came to its end, and the gospel of the world's hope began. Of other careers death is the close; with that of Jesus it was the second and more vital beginning. The story of other lives is told in biography, opening with birth and unfolding through the years of activity. That of Jesus' life was told by Paul in the triple statement that he died for our sins, that he was buried and that he rose from the dead the third day—thus beginning where others end. To those who told the story in the first years of the church's career, these three facts seemed more important than all else in the Master's ministry.

But the death of Christ is significant, not as an isolated fact, but as the consummation and interpretation of his life. His whole career and its purposes can be understood in the light of this event as they could not otherwise. The death was the fruit which his life bore, and in which it voiced itself. As the life of the tree remains without issue and its purposes are unexpressed unless it bear fruit, so the life of Jesus would have remained without its supreme value if the death of the cross had not been its completion. This is not to underestimate the value of the life in itself. The tree has beauty and fragrance, and gives shade, even if it has no fruit; but its highest function is unfilled.

But the ministry of Jesus is a unit. His life and death were vital parts of an undivisible whole. The absence of either element would have made the sum incomplete. When the death of Christ was preached in the early church, it had its value as the fitting close of such a life as he had lived. The work of Christ was a totality not to be divided into sections and compartments. The end explains the entire life. Jesus' whole career was sacrificial. He was bearing away the sin of the world during all his life. In this appears the true priestly character of our Lord's work. The swing from Romanism and the earlier type of Protestant dogma has so strongly emphasized the prophetic mission of Jesus that his priestly function is in danger of neglect. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews rightly insists on this side of his redemptive work, nor does he mean that the sacrificial work of Jesus consisted in shedding his blood. The blood idea, which so pervaded the older system of worship that the temple courts reeked with the blood of slaughtered beasts and the priests tended to be little more than masters of shambles, had no place in the new covenant save as the blood of Christ formed to the Hebrew mind a connecting link with Judaism, and served to represent his life, his will, his entire being, surrendered freely to God in devotion to the ends of redemption.

The death of Christ set before the world the awful cost of sin. No lesson could be so impressive as to the disaster which the transgression of righteousness always works. To be assured that our sins are black and unsightly may perhaps avail to turn some to better lives, but for most nothing less suffices than the shock of comprehending that just such sins as ours cost Jesus his life, and that by our sin to-day we evermore crucify the Son of God afresh. Such a spectacle as the cross of Christ not only makes odious the special sins that killed him, the disappointed ambition of Judas, the envy of the priests, the cowardice of Pilate, but serves to put all deflections from right thought and conduct in their true perspective, as charged with consequences so dreadful that no sin can ever again be called small. Moreover, Jesus' submission to the effects of human hatred was the most potent method of meeting it. He would make no compromise with sin, nor would he meet it with the usual weapons. It was better to disregard it, or to suffer in silence and thus win the more decisive victory by seeming to be utterly defeated. There are attacks which are too insignificant to be noticed and which light harmlessly on all save those who aim them. Then there are deeper and deadlier attempts to stab character and ruin reputation which, though they may cause suffering, can only be met with patience, in the consciousness that one who has ruled his spirit to quiet confidence in the vindicating power of truth is already victor in advance, and that evil cannot be more surely defeated than by the full display of its character. By submission to the death which his foes had so laboriously planned, Jesus gained the most signal of victories.

Perhaps the most notable effect of the death of Christ was the exhibition of divine love there manifested. Jesus had preached the truth of God's love to man, but the attestation which his death gave to it was commanding and convincing. It showed that the divine love would go all lengths to prove its reality to doubting men, and forever convince them of the truly paternal, the loving, indeed the suffering tenderness of God. Here was a secret which no word was strong enough to fully disclose—only a tremendous act could enforce it. God desires the happiness and love of his children. He desires it above all else. He goes to the uttermost to show them his attitude toward them, and the fatal consequences of indifference to his love. The whole process of revelation has one burden—the love of God to men, and the consummation of that process is the cross of Christ. It is the mighty appeal which God makes to man, not to his sympathy alone, but to his reason, his intelligence, his sense of truth and justice, his ideal of moral symmetry, his consciousness of the awfulness of separation from the divine life.

Once more, the death of Christ is vicarious, not in the sense that it provides an easy path for man to evade the consequences of sin by shifting them upon the head of Christ, but that he appears in this sacrificial act as our true representative, our vicar, and pledges us by all the sacred obligations of our relation to him to take up our cross and follow him. It is true that the death of Christ has made possible man's redemption from sin in a sense so profound and majestic that its full significance is quite beyond the narrow limits of any small theological definition. But man is not so easily relieved of responsibility as the church has often been concerned to teach. The righteousness of Jesus is not imputed to men by any transfer of accounts in the old legal or commercial sense; it is rather imparted to them by a living union with him, in which the purposes and the motives of his life become theirs, and thus they tread the path of service and sacrifice which he has first of all trodden. He has opened the door of the highest life, and we enter after him.

Bro. Pritchard's Book.

I hear much about this book, especially by those who have secured it and read it It is certainly a book of great value. Bro. Pritchard in this book has considered great and important questions, and has shown wonderful familiarity in his treatment of them. He is a powerful thinker, and his wonderful memory enables him to tell, in no dubious terms, what he has seen and heard and thought out during his long and busy career. His book ought to be possessed by every one who is anxious for a clear statement of the truths of the New Testament.

Recently I heard Rev. Moody state what books young people should have in order to get needed help in the reading and proper understanding of the New Testament. A few days after a young lady said to me: "Bro. Moore, can you tell me the titles of those books that Mr. Moody mentioned the other night?" I said: "No, I cannot. A man who handles the New Testament the way that Mr. Moody does is not the one to tell what books to read in order to its proper understanding." Bro. Pritchard's book is of greater value to one seeking to know the cardinal teachings of the New Testament than a multitude of books would be whose authors failed to discern what are the functions of the gospel and the church. No one who is incompetent to rightly divide the Word of God and to show the relationship of the law to the gospel is prepared to properly introduce any one to the right way of looking at the New Testament.

Any one who will secure Bro. Pritchard's book and read it will prize it very much. This book can be had for $1.25. Address Henry R. Pritchard, 2007 Senate Ave., Indianapolis, Ind.

TOPIC FOR JUNE 11.

A PERFECT CHILD.

(Luke 2:40-52.)

Who does not know Hofmann's picture of Christ in the Temple? There he stands, that gentle boy, with his brave, sweet face, with his great, dark, intelligent, honest eyes, with his full, feeling mouth. There is no petulance in his manner, no overbearing self-confidence, no aggressive impertinence; just childlike wonder and insight. When one looks into that charming face, one better understands the words, "Except ye become as little children, ye shall in nowise enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Luke's Gospel has been called the Gospel of the infancy, because it tells more than any other about the birth and childhood of Jesus; and how precious to us has become that Gospel of the infancy! How it ties us to the human in Jesus' nature! How it brings him home to the door of childhood, and permits him to make common cause with the simplicity and weakness of little ones! We could ill dispense with these proofs that Jesus, like us, understood as a child, thought as a child, spake as a child.

Like a perfect child, he was docile, teachable. He was subject to his parents. At Mary's knee and in Joseph's shop he grew in wisdom. Of the doctors he aske questions. Children are pre-eminently open to new truth. They accept what is told them with implicit belief. They are even led astray sometimes by their open, docile minds. With us older ones the greater danger is that we shall be too incredulous, that we shall cling too closely to preconceived ideas, that our minds shall not be sufficiently open to the truth. Except ye become as little children, and open your hearts for truth, ye shall not enter the kingdom of truth.

A little child, especially the perfect child, is frank and honest. No jury so unbiased as a group of boys. Fair, square, even blunt in their judgments—so was Jesus all his life through. No compromise was there with him in dealing with what he disapproved, no smoothing over and deception or flattery. "With unveiled face, reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord," he dealt frankly with all. O, that we might break down this wall of partition that separates us one from another, and be more frank, open and honest in our dealings one with another!

The child grows, the perfect child, most of all. Jesus waxed strong. Be not discouraged, fellow Endeavorer, if you are weak. We are babes in Christ. We shall wax strong. Oftentimes we shall fall, and hurt ourselves. In unguarded moments we shall give way. But if we are like little children, we will up and on again.

WALES.

The Welsh, or, as they call themselves, Oymry, are descended from the ancient Celts and adhere with tenacity to the customs of their forefathers. They are a hardy race, brave and generous, but impulsive and irascible.

Inhabitants of the rural districts yet speak the Celtic tongue and are superstitious and fanatical. The chief characteristic of their simple costume is the tall, black hat with wide, round brim. These hats are considered valuable heirlooms and are handed down through several generations. The illustration in another column shows a Welsh mother and daughter wearing such hats, the daughter being seated at a Singer sewing machine.

Singer machines are used in Wales almost universally; 40 Singer offices are conveinently located throughout the country so that Singer operators can easily obtain necessary accessories and their machines receive careful attention from Singer employees.

First Things—III.

F. D. Power, Director.

Pentecost gives us, not only the first preaching of the gospel and the first covenants, but here also are the first Christians. Here is the first place in all the Bible where the church is spoken of as an existing institution. "And the Lord added daily to the church the saved."

What sort of people are these? What do we find recorded of them? "They continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers."

1. They continued steadfastly. Constant were those disciples. Many go into camp and like the life of a soldier for a time, but soon turn away from the battlefield. Many are easily persuaded to take up the profession of religion, and as easily lay it down. Constancy is a hard word. Taking the cross daily, praying always, watching night and day, never throwing off the armor, never unbending in our holy waiting before God and walking with God—this is where men fail. These Pentecostal converts were constant. Theywere not moved from their purpose by opposition. The things taught them by the apostles they cleaved unto. The ties and duties of brotherhood they met regularly. The remembrance of Christ's death in the supper they observed without fail. Always, they were praying men and women.

2. Again, united were these early Christians. "All that believed were together, and had all things common." "The multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul." They had not yet come to the sin of sectarianism. They did not branch off into a dozen separate schools at different street corners into "St. Peter's Church," "St. James' Church," "St. Matthew's Church," and so on through the catatogue of apostles. This disharmony and disunity was a sin of later times.

Christ prayed that his people might be one, and they were one. Christ intended by that union the world should be conquered, and in three centuries Rome, which was then the world, was at the foot of the cross. Christ means to-day that the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ by the united service of his people. A single drop of water is a weak and powerless thing, but an infinite number, united by the force of attraction, form a stream, and many streams combined form a river, and many rivers pour their water into oceans, whose proud waves, defying the power of man, none can stop but the Creator who formed them. And so resistless would be the power of God's people thus consolidated and hurled against sin. Patience. There is a legend that when Adam and Eve were turned out of Eden an angel smashed the gates, and the fragments flying all over the earth are the precious stones. Patience. In God's own good time we shall fit our fragments together and reconstruct the gates of Paradise! The era of reconciliation is dawning. The body of Christ will yet be one as in the beginning.

3. These first Christians were charitable. "They had all things common, and sold their possesions and goods, and parted them to all, as every man had need." Nothing like this had ever been seen before. The Jews in violation of their law neglected the poor. Among heathen nations systematic provision for the wants of the needy was unknown. It was, therefore, a new thing under the sun to see persons selling houses and lands to supply the needy. It could not fail to have great effect, so we read: "And with great power gave the apostles their witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, and great grace was upon them all."

It was not communistic or socialistic, for only such as were in want received anything.

Christian benevolence will always make the church mighty. Christ spared not himself; why should the church spare herself. The wealth I have is not mine, why should I hoard it? Christians would be godlike: how can they be like God so much as in doing good to men? "Are you God's wife?" asked a ragged, cold, hungry little girl of a Christian woman who took her on the streets of New York, shivering and forlorn, and gave her food and clothes. "Are you you God's wife?" Why should men be hungry when there are cattle upon a thousand hills? Why should children cry for bread when barns are bursting with heaven's bountifully given grain? The moon gives the light she receives from the sun; shall we not bestow the benefits received from God to the profit of our neighbor? Ah, the church must remember the poor if she would be apostolic.

4. Finally, these first Christians were joyful. "They, continueing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God and having favor with all the people." "Happy are the people whose God is the Lord." In the midst of tribulation, even, they rejoice.

One of the marks of apostolic Christianity is its blessedness, its joy. The gospel is a message of joy, "Glad tidings of great joy." One of the fruits of the Spirit is joy. "The kingdom of heaven is not meat and drink, but love, joy, peace." "God sends ten thousand singing truths into the Christian's heart, singing as birds in the springtime, as a forest of nightingales might break forth on a winter's night."

The world needs this joy, and God sends joys, Christ gives peace, the Holy Spirit is the Comforter. Would we be apostolic, we must be God's happy children, Christ's blessed ones, Heaven's heirs of eternal delights with One in whose presence there is fullness of joy, and at whose right hand there are pleasures forevermore. To such a service, for such an exaltation, Christ calls every man.

DEJARNETTE.

Martha Ellen DeJarnette was born in Grant County, Ky., Dec. 19th, 1839; died in Montgomery City, Mo., April 19th, 1899, aged 59 years and five months. She was the daughter of Harrison and Mary DeJarnette and was one of a family of nine children, five of whom, together with her aged mother, survive her. From a child she seemed religiously inclined, and at the age of 19, near her Kentucky home, she made the "good confession" and was baptized by Bro. Jarrott of sainted memory. From the day of her baptism to that of her death, she lived the life of a consecrated disciple of Christ. About six months ago her health gave way under a severe spell of la grippe, she growing gradually worse until death came to her relief Toward the last her sufferings were intense, yet she bore them all with Christian fortitude and grace. It was a source of strength to talk with her about her Savior and her hope of eternal life. Speaking to her pastor just prior to her death, she said, "The promises of Jesus are sweeter to me than ever before; I am just trusting him and waiting his time." She loved her church with a constant devotion, was loyal to all its benevolences Although possessing but little of of "this world's goods" she never failed to contribute something whenever a collection was taken for any missionary or church enterprise. She will be greatly missed, but our loss is her and Heaven's gain. After a funeral discourse by the writer in the Montgomery City Christian church, we buried her body in the beautiful city cemetery there to await the resurrection morn. C. C. HILL.

KITCHEN.

Mary Elizabeth Grimes was born in Randolph Co., Virginia, April 30, 1828. While a child she came with her parents to Randolph Co., Mo., where she resided until her death, May 10, 1899. In 1845 she married Levi Gee, by whom she had born to her six children. In 1860 she married Richard Kitchen, by whom she had four children. She leaves a husband and six chidren to mourn the loss of a kind mother and affectionate wife. She lived a consistent member of the Christian Church until her death, beloved by those who knew her. Her children are all members of the same church, one of whom is a young but acceptable and worthy minister. The family love music, and we hope to see them all on a brighter shore singing the "melodious songs of the blest." Funeral by the writer. Fraternally,

T. W. STRAWN.

KEY.

Eldon Weldon, son of Wm. T. Key and Mary Key, was born April 5, 1898, and died May 20, 1899, aged one year, one month and 15 days. The funeral services were conducted by the writer in the Salem church, after which the remains were interred in the Salem cemetery. His soul, unpolluted by sin, has returned to God who gave it. F. E. BLANCHARD.

Barnard, Mo.

McDONALD.

Solomon McDonald was born in Pormotoon, N. S. June 18, 1818. Moved to Haverhill, Mass,, in 1861. From early manhood he loyally served his Lord and Master. He was elder of the church in Ayers Village a long number of years. On the disbanding of that congregrtion, he was one of the prime movers in planting the organization now known as High Street Church of Christ, Haverhill, Mass. Faithful in the Bible-school and regularly did he meet in the church to worship. Patient in his suffering, he at last fell asleep April 17, 1899. His son and daughter may take comfort in the thought, he was a good man and fought a good fight. The writer, who was his pastor for two years, never had a better friend and holds his memory precious.

Belle Vernon, Pa.

McGEE.

Bro. T. S. McGee departed this life May 14, 1899, at the advanced age of 79 years, four months and one day. Bro. McGee had been a member of the Pleasant Hill Christian Church for a number of years, He loved the church. Funeral services were conducted by the writer Monday, May 15, 1899. W. F. HAMANN.

PENNINGTON.

Delilah Pennington, whose maiden name was Shannon, was born in Knox County, Tenn., September 27, 1816; died December 4, 1898, aged 82 years, two months and seven days. She moved with her parents when three years old to Shawneetown, Ill., living there until she was 13 years of age, when they moved and located where the town of Industry now stands. She was married to Richard Pennington Jan. 30, 1834. There were born to them 12 children, Elizabeth, Catharine, Cordelia, Sarilda, Alice, Ella and Edward are living. Charles, Albert, Richard, Elnora and Alford are dead. Bro. Pennington, her husband, departed this life Oct. 26, 1891. Sept. 3, 1848, she united with the Christian Church, of which she was a devoted member until her death. Bro. Pennington was also an honored member for many years. He served as elder of the church at New Salem, McDonough County, Ill. Both loved the Church of Christ with that fidelity that was admired by all who knew them. Their Christian lives are to be emulated by all who love the Lord Jesus Christ. The funeral was preached by the writer at the old home at Pennington's Point.

TUCKER.

At the ripe age of almost 83 years David Tucker passed from this life to the life beyond. Beginning his religious life in the Baptist Church in 1852 he never faltered in his faith in Christ. After moving to Farmer City he united with the Church of Christ there, where he loyally served the Master till called away. Before his death on March 6th he said, "I'm packed up ready to go." May our dear Lord comfort and sustain the lonely companion, who for near 59 years walked so joyfully by his side. "There remaineth a rest for the people of God." E. C. STARK.

WAUGHOP.

Not many in so few years put more into life or win more from life than she whose transition we now in sadness record. Marcie Waughop was born June 30, 1867. At the age of 16 years she entered Eureka College and graduated June 14, 1888. She then taught four years in the public schools near her home. In the autumn of 1892 she entered Wellesley College in Massachusetts, where for one year she pursued special studies in English literature and history, thus advancing her preparation for the life work to which her ambition led. She taught four years in Eureka High School. In the fall of 1897 she was called to take charge of the English Literature department of Eureka College. This difficult position she filled with credit and with her characteristic energy. Her ambition and industry proved too much for her physical strength. In February last she was compelled by failing health to relinquish her hold upon the active duties of her position. Since that date her suffering has been most intense. It has been borne with a patience, cheerfulness and self-mastery most remarkable. At her home in Henry, Ill., on the evening of April 30, 1889, at the age of 31 years and 10 months, her short and beautiful earth-life closed. She was born anew in Christ at the early age of 15 years under the ministry of Bro. A. B. Wade, stepping from the innocence of childhood into the innocence of the children of God. She "held the beginning of her confidence steadfast to the end," and failed not to grow in Christ while pressing forward in other accomplishments. Her talents, which were of a high order, were humbly consecrated to her divine Master. She was deeply devotional in spirit and zealous for his cause. She rejoiced in his service, yearned for the salvation of others and strove to uplift the world while making it happier Both in living and in dying she exemplified the triumphs of the gospel. On the morning of her last day she selected to be sung in her behalf, in the worship of the Lord's house, the hymn beginning:

"My Savior, as Thou wilt!
O may Thy will be mine!
Into Thy hand of love
I would my all resign;
Through sorrow, or through joy
Conduct me as Thine own,
And help me still to say,
My Lord, Thy will be done!"

As a student she was accurate, painstaking and industrious, choosing and maintaining a high standard of excellence. Fellow students always found in her an inspiration to high endeavor. As a teacher she was conscientious and thorough. As a friend she was helpful, considerate and constant. In the home she was affectionate and self-forgetful.

C. B. DAENEY.

WHITE.

April 27, 1899, another of the faithful Disciples and a charter member of this church has passed away from among us into his eternal rest, having journeyed by his ninetieth milestone. David White came to New Orleans from Ireland when 12 years of age; steamboated on the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers, traveled much in the Eastern and Middle states and finally settled in Louisiana. He was twice married, and is survived by two children and several grandchildren. During his declining years he made his home with his son, Matthew White, of Mt. Sterling, where kind and loving hands constantly ministered unto him. We have lost a dear friend and brother whose life is a rich legacy to the Church of Christ.

Publishers' Notes.

A Place in the Home Library.

"'Men of Yesterday,' by T. W. Grafton, is written in that pleasing style that made the 'Life of Alexander Campbell,' by the same author, so greatly admired. The Disciples have put out many excellent books in recent years, and our own publications ought to have a larger place in our home libraries. 'Men of Yesterday' would be an especially good book to put in the hands of young people. The narrations are full of interest, and these are men with whom the generation now growing up should have some acquaintance." — Editor Christian Tribune, Baltimore, Md.

"Men of Yesterday," by T. W. Grafton, contains biographical sketches of the following six prominent men: Walter Scott, B. W. Stone, John Smith, Isaac Errett, Barton W. Stone and Otis A. Burgess. The work embraces 291 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and the price is $1 00 per copy, postpaid.

Samples Sent Free.

Sunday-schools that are not using or that are not acquainted with the extensive series published by the Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo., should write for samples at once. The third quarter is near at hand and Sunday-schools should begin preparations for their supplies for the third quarter. A sample set will be sent by mail on receipt of application. In this sample set will be found a copy of every kind published by the Christian Publishing Co., among which is literature adapted to all grades in Sunday-schools.

Vacation Time

Is now at hand for the school teachers, and their season of leisure might be occupied with great profit by reading a book which gives the methods of the greatest teacher the world has known. "Jesus as a Teacher," by Prof. B. A. Hinsdale, is worthy the attention of the school teachers of to-day. The author presents practical thought not usually found in books on this subject. Prof. Hinsdale's long experience in the school-room has specially fitted him to write on educational subjects. The school teachers of this time should go direct to the greatest of teachers for instruction. Prof. Hinsdale very aptly says: "Waiting upon the teaching of the rabbi was eating the husk on which the swine fed. Waiting upon Christ's teaching was sitting dowing at the feast the prodigal's father spread." It is a book of 330 pages, neat cloth binding, and the price is $1.25, postpaid.

The Science and Pedagogy of Ethics.

The new book by H. W. Everest, the well-known author and scholar, is nearing completion. Those who have read "The Divine Demonstration," a former work of Prof. Everests', know full well his literary ability and scholarship. It is not saying too much to intimate that his last is his best literary production. It will be a book worthy the attention of the thoughtful student, preacher and teacher.

Bible Characters.

Books on Bible characters are interesting to those who like to study the history of prominent persons mentioned in the Old Testament. The Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, has published several such books during the last few months, among which are the following:

"In the Days of Jehu," By J. Breckenridge Ellis, price 75 cents.

"King Saul," by J. Breckenridge Ellis, price $1.00.

"Queen Esther," by M. M. Davis, price 75 cents.

Any one who will carefully read these books will have a better understanding of the lives of these historic chcracters, and a greater insight into Bible history.

As soon as possible other books will be published on other prominent Bible characters.

Capital Punishment.

Our Bro. S. T. Willis, who says so many good things, I dissent from in regard to his opposition of capital punishment. I hope he will study well Numbers 35, and then read Mr. Campbell on the same subject in Popular Lectures, and I hope he will at least doubt the correctness of his position.

Then as his people are my people, his kin my kin, I want him to get out of the company of Col. Robt. Ingersoll and all other infidels so far as known to me 'Twas said to me once: "I heard a woman say she heard you was in favor of capital punishment, and therefore she would never listen to you preach." I inquired if she was not an infidel and was answered in the affirmative.

I know Gov. Roosevelt must have felt badly to know that the Colonel had filed his objections to the execution of the murderess in New York. It added greatly to my estimate of the Governor. I doubt not some other stepmother will halt about the time she is thinking of taking a meat-axe to a stepdaughter. I doubt not an hundred lives have been saved by the execution of the anarchists in Chicago in 1887.

I stood where that bomb was thrown that killed those policemen at the Haymarket and counted twenty-nine business houses all save two saloons. Over some of these was taught every first day of the week to the rising generation, enmity to God, the Bible, law and order. I have no argument to offer now, but will wait tlil I hear an answer to those made by Mr. Campbell and the Word of God already referred to. S. W. Crutcher.

What We Plead For

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition,
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY, 1522 LOCUST ST, ST. LOUIS, MO

A Circuit of the Globe.

By A. McLEAN,

Secretary Foreign Christian Missionary Society.

This book contains 62 chapters, 384 large pages of printed matter, and more than 100 portraits and illustrations. The pictures of all the foreign missionaries of the Christian Church, their homes and places of worship, are among the illustrations.

In August, 1895, Secretary McLean, having been granted a leave of absence for one year, started on a visit to all our Foreign Missions, and this volume records in the author's terse, clear style, the impressions he received, the sights he saw, and the needs of our missionaries on the field. It contains a fund of information on the customs of the countries visited, the lives of the people, and the success of our missions. The book is profusely illustrated with pictures taken on the spot. The book is written in a most fascinating manner, enabling the reader to feel as though he had made the trip with the writer. The author set out from Cincinnati, Ohio, crossing the American continent to San Francisco, then across the Pacific Ocean to Japan, stopping at Honolulu, then to China, India, Australia, Egypt, Palestine, Turkey, European countries to London, across the Atlantic to America, and then home. The book gives the social, political and religious phases of the many nations visited by the author. Cash must accompany the order.

NEW JUVENILES

Saturday Talk Series of Biographical Sketches

BY MRS. LAURA GEROULD CRAIG.

PUBLISHED IN SIX VOLUMES. PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

Vol. I. Little Presidents.
Vol. II. Little Kings.
Vol. III. Little Queens.
Vol. IV. Little Orators.
Vol. V. Little Generals.
Vol. VI. Little Statesmen.

"THE FAREWELL KISS"—ILLUSTRATION FROM "LITTLE QUEENS."

The author thoroughly understands the mental wants of the child, and in these volumes these wants are happily met. The biographical sketches of the great men of the world, while they were growing into greatness, are always fascinating to the children.

These stories are presented in such an attractive manner that the mind of the child will retain them all through life. The little folks that will carefully read these stories will be in possession of many of the little incidents in the lives of a large number of the great men and women who have blessed the world with their lives. These little volumes should be placed in the homes of this country to bless children. The little ones of the family should know the facts given in this series of biographical stories, and thus early in life they can be taught that the "Lives of great men all remind us we can make our lives sublime."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Diplomatic relations between the United States and Spain were resumed on Saturday, June 3, when President McKinley received the new Spanish minister, the Duc d'Orcos, and Bellamy Storer, the recently appointed American representative at Madrid, was presented to the Queen Regent. The ceremony at the White House was very simple, and the speeches of the President and the Spanish minister were brief and formal expressions of satisfaction at the restoration of amicable relations between the two nations. As regards their mutual relations, the two countries are now just where they were before the war, except for the memories of the contest. It is the duty of the hour to forget that Spain has been our enemy, and to remember only that she is our friend. We do not want to be burdened with any traditional animosities.

At the opening of the Spanish Cortes, the Queen Regent announced in her speech from the throne that the Sagasta ministry before retiring had sold to Germany the most important of Spain's remaining insular possessions. When the transaction took place nobody knows except those who engineered it, for the whole affair was conducted with the most perfect secrecy and was not suspected until the official announcement was made. The transfer includes the Caroline Islands, the Island of Palaos and the Ladrones (or Marianne) except Guam which had already been ceded to the United States. It is understood that the purchase price is about $5,000,000, and that Germany allows Spain to retain a coaling station in each of the three groups and agrees to protect it in case of war. The acquisition of these islands, which are small in size but vast in number, gives Germany almost unbroken possession of all the land between the Philippines and Hawaii. Bismarck long looked with envious eye upon the Carolines and at one time disputed Spain's title to them. The matter was committed to the Pope for arbitration and he confirmed the Spanish claim. Since then there has been no dispute as to Spain's ownership and there is no disposition now to dispute her right to sell what is her own to whomsoever she pleases. There are only queries as to how close a friendship this indicates between Germany and Spain, and whether Germany's agreement to protect the coaling stations in time of war may not possibly involve a definite alliance. It is a good bargain for Germany because she has use for these islands and can protect them. It is also a good bargain for Spain for she gets a round sum for property which she could neither use nor protect. The only remnant of Spanish colonial possessions is a few insignificant stations in Africa, with a population not exceeding 135,000, which she can neither sell, give away nor keep to advantage.

The convention of the Ohio Valley League of Bimetallic Clubs, which met at Louisville, Ky., last week, was an interesting sequel to the Anti-Trust banquet in St. Louis the week before. Just as one naturally expected to hear anti-trust sentiments given most prominence at an anti-trust dinner, so, at a meeting of bimetallic clubs, of course, one would expect to hear the chief emphasis laid upon the silver question. In neither case did this natural expectation go unrealized. The significance of the expressions of sentiments at these two gatherings lies in the fact that they are in some sense official statements of the Democratic policy for the next campaign. At Louisville there was hearty approval of the declaration that the Chicago platform of '96 must be reaffirmed without the omission of a single item, and that anti-trust and anti-expansion paragraphs must be added. This is exactly what Champ Clark said and the anti-trust meeting approved in St. Louis. But the emphasis was different. While the meeting at St. Louis proposed to make the anti-trust plank the leading feature of the platform and relegate silver to second place, the convention at Louisville insisted on the primacy of the currency question. Mr. Altgeld, who spoke at both gatherings, was obviously more at home at the bimetallic convention and his speech harmonized better with the views there prevalent. An anti-trust plank is well enough, he says, but a campaign cannot be conducted on this issue. Here denunciation of monopolies is a cheap device for catching popular favor, but the public will interpret it as mere demagoguery, says Mr. Altgeld, and will recoil from it if pushed as the main issue. The campaign must center about the free silver question and the ratio of 16 to 1 must be maintained. There was in his speech an implicit threat of withdrawal from the party ranks if free silver at 16 to 1 is not kept to the front in the campaign.

The Court of Cassation has delivered its final decision in the Dreyfus case. The verdict of Dec. 22, 1894, by which Dreyfus was declared guilty of revealing military secrets to a foreign power, is quashed and annulled on the ground that the alleged confession of Captain Dreyfus has been disproven and that the bordereau, which contained the secrets which he was supposed to have revealed was not written by Dreyfus, but apparently by Esterhazy. On these and other grounds, the sentence of the former court-martial is set aside and the prisoner is ordered to be brought before another court-martial at Rennes. Since the arguments in favor of revision were all arguments in support of the innocence of the prisoner, it is not doubted that the new trial will result in a speedy acquittal. The fact that Esterhazy was tried and acquitted on the charge of writing the bordereau saves him from prosecution now that it has become practically certain that he did write it. Relying on the principle of law that a man can not be put in jeopardy twice for the same offense, Esterhazy is even confessing that he wrote the bordereau and virtually asking the authorities what they are going to do about it. Their answer is the arrest of Col. du Paty de Clam who used his influence to save Esterhazy when he was under trial and who is suspected of having prompted him to the writing of the guilty document. Paty de Clam was more immediately responsible than any one else for the imprisonment and condemnation of Dreyfus and it seems extraordinarily appropriate that he should be confined, as he is, in the same cell where Dreyfus was lodged pending his trial. The acquittal of Dreyfus leaves open the question as to who did the deed that was charged upon Dreyfus. Unquestionably, somebody was guilty of treason. The trial of Paty de Clam may reveal the culprit and at the same time may be the means of punishing the conspiracy against Dreyfus.

During the last days of the deliberations of the Court of Cassation, when its verdict could be forcasted with such certainty that the public almost lost interest in the proceedings, another attraction was presented to the French people by the return of Major Marchand, the hero of Fashoda. The occupation and subsequent surrender of Fashoda at the demand of the British did not net France any particular advantage in the rivalry in Africa and brought her perilously near to the brink of a disastrous war, but it was a brilliant exploit for Major Marchand and his arrival at Toulon, and later at Paris, was the occasion of a demonstration. There was a futile attempt by the anti-Dreyfusites to lionize Marchand and, by trading upon his momentary popularity, gain the favor of the crowd for the military party and so turn the court against Dreyfus. But Marchand saw how the situation stood and refused to ally himself with a cause which was already lost. He received a stirring ovation both at Toulon and again at Paris, but he sensibly refused to allow himself to be made a dangerous military hero of the Boulanger type.

David B. Henderson, of Iowa, will succeed Thomas B. Reed as speaker of the House of Representatives. That has been decided with as much certainty as can attach to any political action which is not strictly official. A caucus was held by mail and telegraph and Col. Henderson received the pledges of 102 votes and 60 more are counted upon as probable. Since 93 is a majority of the Republican representatives, Col. Henderson's election may be considered a certainty. Some of the Eastern Representatives, friends of Mr. Sherman, of New York, at first tried to boom Henderson, as an offset Mr. Hopkins, of Illinois, whose candidacy threatened to win the united support of the West. But the Henderson boom proved to be a very serious matter and the withdrawal of Mr. Hopkins from the race left the Iowa man in command of the situation. The new speaker has long been considered one of the strongest men in the House. He is a Scotchman by birth, has been in Congress since 1882 and has been the leading Republican member of the committee on rules and chairman of the judiciary committee.

The Ohio Republican nominating convention, which met at Columbus, June 1, gave promise of keeping up the reputation of the state for complicated political situations. When the convention met, with about one-fourth of the delegates contesting their places, with an even dozen candidates for the governorship in the field, at least seven of whom were aggressive and hopeful, and with Hanna still keeping secret his preferences and withholding his influence, the situation presented a good political puzzle. The one really certain element was Mr. Kurtz's long-cherished desire to "wipe Hanna off the political map of Ohio." The key to the puzzle was found in the overwhelming influence of Mr. Hanna, which secured the nomination of Judge Nash for governor by an easy majority on the second ballot. The realization of Mr. Kurtz's ambition seems to be indefinitely postponed. For practical purposes, Mr. Hanna's sphere of influence, speaking after the manner of the powers, is thoroughly established in Ohio to the obliteration of his ancient foe. Mr. Hanna blandly remarks that the ticket as nominated is proof positive that there are no factions in the ranks of Ohio Republicanism. The platform as adopted is strong in its endorsement of the administration and Judge Nash, as the Hanna candidate, will represent that plank more fully than any other man would have done. What the real issues of the campaign will be can scarcely be predicted until the Democratic convention meets and defines its position.

The recent order of President McKinley, exempting nearly ten thousand officers from the civil service regulations was a surprise to the country. It has been felt by a large number of persons that some modifications of the system were sorely needed, but the people were hardly prepared for such a sweeping order as that issued by the President. The confidence of the people in McKinley has been such that they will naturally be slow to condemn him for his present action, believing that he had some good reasons therefor, but since these reasons are not forthcoming it is beginning to be feared by even some of his political friends that a trick has been played upon him by politicians, and that he has taken a backward step that cannot but do injury to his reputation as a popular national executive. The Chicago Tribune, June 5th, an administration paper goes so far as to say that, "It looks much like a gigantic political confidence game, played by spoilsmen upon the President of the United States." That his action was urged chiefly by spoilsmen in search of jobs for their political favorites, even against his will, as asserted by the Tribune, will at least not add to his popularity nor second-term prospects. The country is not prepared for a backward step at this stage of its history, and the people will not be slow to resent such a tendency. If there are reasons, however, for his order, not yet given, it is to be hoped that they will not be longer withheld. We should regret to see the power of political spoilsmen increased at anytime, much less under present conditions.

UNION OF TEMPERANCE FORCES.

While abating no jot or tittle of what we have said in the past in advocacy of Christian union, and while we believe that the time is coming when our Lord's prayer for the unity of His followers shall be fulfilled, the time has already come, it seems to us, when it ought to be possible to unite the temperance forces of the country in some practicable plan to suppress the liquor traffic and stop the ravages of intemperance. There are millions of people in the United States, scattered throughout the various religious and political organizations, who are practically of one mind as to the necessity of some wise and energetic action against the saloon and in behalf of our homes, our institutions, our religion, and of the best interests of society. They believe the liquor traffic to be an unqualified curse that is spreading wide devastation over the land. They believe it is a source of political corruption, of social disorder, of domestic ruin, of economic disaster, of widespread demoralization, and the feeder and promoter of most of the crimes which crowd the dockets in our courts of justice.

And yet, in spite of this practical unanimity of sentiment against the saloon and its nefarious business, among temperance people, nothing is being done on a scale adequate to meet the demands of the case. True, there are neighborhood reforms here and there in which the licensed saloon is occasionally driven out of a town or community to come back again, perhaps, with a change of local administration, and there is more or less agitation going on through the various temperance organizations, all of which has a value we would not underrate. But in view of the appalling disasters of the accursed business the lack of unanimity of action is greatly to be regretted. It is the supreme obstacle in the way of effective legislation. What can be done to remedy the evil?

Some of us have been voting the prohibition ticket for years, not so much in the hope that it would accomplish any immediate practical results, as because there was nothing else that we could conscientiously do. We were content to be in a minority rather than to affiliate with political parties which dared not deal with this gigantic evil. As long as conditions remain as they are we are likely to continue this course. But many are asking: "Is there not a better way?" Can not this great humanitarian question that has to do with the very life of the nation be lifted above mere partisan lines so that we can concentrate about it all the temperance forces of the country? We do not attempt to say here how it is to be done. We do not dogmatically affirm that it can be done. We are sure, however, that it ought to be done in the interest of the most urgent reform that is now being pressed upon the people of this country. What ought to be, sometime, sooner or later, will be.

There are anti-saloon men in the Republican party, Democratic party, in the Populist party, in the Socialist party, and, if there be any other party claiming the suffrages of the American people, it no doubt contains members who would be glad to deliver an effective blow against the drink traffic. What we would like to see is a union of all these men in all these parties to fight the saloon. If we cannot get them to fight the saloon outside of their party, in an independent organization, is it not possible to include them in some more comprehensive organization, so that they can fight it within their parties? The church, for instance, has its representatives in all political parties. These members are supposed to be true to their obligations as Christians, in whatever party they may belong to. We do not say that they are true to these obligations, but simply that the maintenance of a Christian character is not necessarily inconsistent with co-operating with a political party in carrying out any governmental policy believed to be for the best interests of the people. If a man is a good Christian he will, of course, oppose every measure of his party which antagonizes the teaching of Christ. Is it possible to have a temperance organization so comprehensive in its scope as to include all who are opposed to the liquor traffic, and who are in favor of all wise and practical methods looking to the control of its manufacture and sale—an organization which would permit these men to vote as they pleased on any purely party question, but would commit them to unswerving hostility to the liquor traffic? We do not say that this is practicable without a great deal of previous agitation and preparation. But if it is impracticable, it is only because men are not sufficiently aroused to the awful peril of the licensed dramshop.

These are but tentative questions and suggestions. We feel that something is imperatively demanded to augment the efficiency of our present efforts to dry up this fountain of national dishonor, of political corruption, of domestic tragedy, of individual wretchedness, of crime, of poverty, of disease, of death. Our skirts will not be free from the blood of our fellowmen if we spare any effort within our power to stay the awful tide of iniquity that flows from the drink habit, fostered and established by the licensed saloon. Is it possible that the prayers arising from so many Christian hearts for relief from this awful burden shall issue in no union of forces against this evil? It cannot be.

Who will sound the tocsin for such a union? Who will show us how such union can be effcted? God hasten the day when all who love their fellownen, who love their homes, who love truth and righteousness and purity and social order, will become a mighty host moving forward unitedly to the overthrow of the saloon and the redemption of our country from the curse of strong drink!

MONGREL PROTESTANTISM.

Protestantism is a mnogrel religion, although not to the same extent as Romanism. By the fifteenth century of the Christian era, Christianity was so modified by the legalism of Judaism and by the paganism of the barbarians that it is difficult to say how much of the Christian churches was Christian and how much was pagan. All of the essential features of paganism and Judaism had been grafted into Christianity.

According to the pagan idea, God was angry and wrathful and had to be appeased and propitiated by bloody sacrifices. According to Mosaism, God was a lawgiver, a kind of infinite magistrate, who was to be reconciled, as man was to be saved, by obedience to law. In later Judaism God was a distant God; he was so far away that the chasm had to be bridged by intermediaries of priests and angels. Leviticism, that is,the Levitical law of the middle books of the Pentatuech, combined these three ideas into one system,, the angry God to be propitiated by sacrifice, the legislator and magistrate God, who bestowed salvation in obedience to law ceremonial and moral; the distant God, to be brought near by the intermediation of priests and angels. Romanism took all of these mongrel elements and mixed them with New Testament Christianity, and this was the condition of religious thought and life when Martin Luther appeared at the beginning of the sixteenth century. He undertook to accomplish two things: first, to strip the gospel of these Judaic and pagan elements; and second, to restore to mankind the pure and unmixed religion of Jesus Christ. He said there is no angry God to be appeased by sacrifice; there is no governmental and magistrate God to be reconciled by obedience to law; there is no distant God to be brought near by the pontoon bridge of priests and angels. God is a Father, an intelligent, moral and reasonable God. He loves man and bestows eternal life as the gift of his grace. It is not to be purchased. The pagan is wrong in thinking that it must be purchased by any sacrifice; and the Pharisees are wrong in thinking that it must be purchased by obedience to law. It is not to be purchased at all. There is no price to be paid for it. It is not bought at all. God gives life to all who are willing to receive it. And this willingness to receive it, this desire to possess it, this determination to have it, this choice of it with all which that choice involves—this is faith. So Luther said with Paul, the pagan is wrong, there is no wrath of God to be appeased by sacrifice; the Jew is wrong, there is no distance from God to be bridged by a priest and an altar and a Jewish ritual; the Pharisee is wrong, there is no satisfaction of God to be purchased, no reconciliation with him to be bought by obeying the laws which he has issued. We are simply to take the free gift of God—his life—and then live freely, spontaneously, naturally, because we have received it. "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." When a man has the gift of life he will obey the laws of God as the result of life, not the cause.

This is pure, unmixed New Testament Christianity, and it was the program of Luther four hundred years ago, but Protestantism failed to realize the ideal of Luther, because it brought back the mongrel, pagan and Jewish elements he had tried to cast out. We still have the wrathful and sacrificial God in Protestant theology; we have the distant God approached by priestly intermediaries; we have the legalistic God who bestows salvation on condition of obedience to law; we have the strangled dog of Greek philosophy, the swine's blood of Roman politics, the blessed idol of pagan worldliness, which is the worst mixture of all. We have these things in a modified form as compared with the older and corrupter religion, but still we have them. And this brings up the whole question of purity in religious faith and consistency in religious life.

To what extent will the pure elements in our religious faith counterbalance the impure? And to what extent will the erroneous, the false and the unrighteous in our lives vitiate and neutralize the good? Must a man be wholly right in theory and wholly good in practice before God will give him any credit for what he believes and does? The Samaritan was half right and half wrong, and yet God treats him as if he were wholly and purposely wrong. Is a life of mixed good and evil no more acceptable than one that is altogether evil? Is it no more to be half right than it is to be wholly wrong? Is a half-truth the worst of lies, sure enough? Is it any good for a man to sacrifice a sheep on Sunday if he is going to strangle a dog on Monday? Will the slaughtered ox of one day atone for the slain man of the next? Can we burn incense in the church and bless an idol in the world and be accepted of God? If God will let us in on a mixed theology can we pass muster on a mixed life? If we are all necessarily a mixture of good and evil, what kind and what proportion of good must prevail over the evil in the judgment of God? Here is a man who is kind and generous and genial, and treats his mother well, but he swears, drinks, gambles, and unlike Cæsar's wife his morals are not above suspicion. How will God balance these conditions, and which will prevail over the other in the last account? Here is a sister who works hard and faithfully one day to gather money to convert the heathen to Christ; the next she gambles in a game of Progressive Euchre with equal if not with greater enthusiasm. Whether the obligation of religious zeal on the one hand will prevail over the swine's blood of worldliness in the other, or the reverse, is a question I am unable to decide.

But there is one thing on which I am clear: God does not require doctrinal perfection of the human mind. If intellectual infallibility is a condition of salvation, then I will not be saved, and neither will you. If God makes no allowance for the imperfection and limitation of our mental faculties in judging of the truth, it is a sorry lookout for the wisest and best of men. God does not require perfection of mind, or of theological opinion, or of religious creed, but he does require a pure faith, a pure love, an unmixed loyalty and a sincere purpose to do his will. There may be error in the understanding on many things, and imperfection in our performances, but there must be no error in the will, and none in the heart, and none in the motive and purpose that leads us to serve God. The will must be sanctified, the heart must be right, the motive must be sincere, the desire for truth and righteousness must be strong. God may tolerate a little paganism in the creed, as he has done before in the Christian world, but his particular abomination is a pagan heart and a pagan life. You may not be infallible in your notions of religion, or in your interpretations of the Bible, but you must be right in purpose, and strong in your desire to be a better man and a better woman.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Never was the question of human relationship and the duties that grow out of it so much studied as at the present time Never have Christian people seen so clearly that they cannot serve God acceptably without serving their fellowmen. What is the law of Christ governing the matter of our relations to our fellownen? Does not Paul give us the answer when he says: "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ?" We often feel that we have enough burdens of our own to bear without undertaking to carry the burdens of others, and we seek to excuse ourselves from any special concern in our neighbor's welfare on that ground. But this is not fulfilling Christ's law. We cannot be indifferent to our brother's needs. A Christian is forbidden to look simply on his "own things," and is taught to "look also upon the things of others." This may not seem pleasant to one who has not felt the weight of adversity pressing him to the earth, and upon whom fortune has smiled, but it is nevertheless the way of the cross. Will not this involve heartaches, sorrow and disappointments? Certainly. But may not these be the very means by which our Heavenly Father would purify and ennoble us, and fit us for the larger service here and hereafter?

In reference to this matter of burden-bearing there are two classes of people: One of them is engaged in making burdens for other people to bear, and the other is assisting in bearing them. Of the first class some are unavoidably burdens to others, and some voluntarily enter upon courses which create burdens for others to carry. Even those who seek to isolate themselves from the sufferings and sorrows of their fellowmen, and who feel sufficient within themselves, are nevertheless a burden to society because their selfishness and indifference are a great obstacle in working out plans of benevolence to alleviate human suffering. Christians are supposed to be burden-bearers. They are to lighten the weight of the world's woe. They are to scatter sunshine along the otherwise darkened paths of their fellowmen. They have found the secret of happiness in right relation with God, and seek to bring others into the same blessedness which they enjoy. Are we doing this? Are we burden-bearers, or burden-makers? Are we leaning on the Everlasting Arm, in order that we may help lift the burdens from the hearts of men?

How may we bear each other's burdens and so fulfill the law of Christ? To do this we must understand what our brother's burden is. We must acquaint ourselves with each other's condition and surroundings. This is why it is necessary for us to "look not every man upon his own things, but also upon the things of others." This precaution will save us often from uncharitable judgments of each other. We may share each other's burdens by sympathy, for often the human heart, in trouble, needs sympathy more than anything else. What relief it gives in time of trouble to feel that some one understands us and really sympathizes with us! There is no balm for the human heart sweeter and more healing than sympathy. It is the sympathy of Jesus Christ that makes Him so potent a Savior, and that binds so many millions of human hearts to Him in bonds of unyielding love. He understands us. He knows our weaknesses and whatever virtue we may have. Therefore we trust Him. Therefore He is leading captive sin-burdened souls who find in Him the peace which the world cannot give.

But Jesus purchased this knowledge of our condition and needs at a great price. He exchanged the "form of God" for the "form of a servant," and "was found in fashion as a man," becoming one of us, bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. "Because the children were partakers of flesh and blood He also himself in like manner partook of the same." He wanted to understand us, and in order to do this He became one of us. For this reason "we have not a high priest who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but who was in all points tempted as we are, yet without sin." In this way Christ became the world's great burden-bearer. He bore our sins and iniquities, and by His stripes are we healed. Just in proportion as we are willing to "condescend to men of low estate," to share in the conditions of our less fortunate fellowmen, are we prepared to sympathize with them and to extend to them the help they need, and so share with them in bearing their burdens. Who is equal to these things? Only he who is filled with the Spirit of Christ. It is only in proportion as the church becomes filled with that Spirit that it can fulfill its divine mission in the world.

This morning at early dawn there was a high-class concert in the great trees that shelter Rose Hill Cottage. It was no ordinary occasion. There were several prima donnas present. One in particular, the leading soprano, made the morning twilight glorious with her melodious notes, as she led the choir. We were enjoying it to the utmost, as were the songsters themselves, when suddenly the night watchman's club rang out on the pavement, and the concert was over. Sensitive as all musicians are, they resented the interruption by flying away to meet another engagement. We would gladly have excused the night watchman from making that round, in order to have enjoyed the concert longer.

We have certain work to do for our needs, and that is to be done strenuously; other work to do for our delight, and that to be done heartily; neither is it to be done by halves or shifts, but with a will; and what is not worth this effort is not to be done at all.—Ruskin.

Hour of Prayer.

TRUE REPENTANCE AND ITS EVIDENCES.

(Luke 3:8-14; Jas. 4:7-10.)

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, June 14th.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: Sin is the great barrier between God and man, and repentance is the only way by which this barrier can be removed. The evidence of genuine repentance is a reformation of life.

Repentance is a duty that has been inculcated under every dispensation. Its necessity grows out of the awful fact of sin. Of all the men who have lived upon the earth only One was free from the duty of repentance, and it was He who "knew no sin."

The first Scripture passage cited above presents John, the forerunner of Christ, insisting upon repentance and upon the fruits thereof. There came to his baptism among others those who prided themselves on their Abrahamic descent and supposed that would be sufficient to admit them to John's baptism and to the blessings of that kingdom which he announced as near at hand. John told them in his plain, blunt way that God could raise up children to Abraham out of the very stones; that a new test was to be applied to character; that "every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is to be hewn down and cast into the fire." This heroic statement brought out several inquiries from the multitude as to what they must do—a sure sign of a good sermon. The brave preacher proceeded to tell each class of persons the respect in which their lives would have to be reformed, suiting his direction to their respective sins.

Repentance itself, strictly speaking, is an act of the mind—a decision of the will. The evidences of it are to be looked for in reformation of life, and any so-called repentance that does not issue in a change of life is not genuine.

Akin to John the Baptist, in spirit and method, was James, from whose writings the second passage is taken. After severely denouncing the sins of those to whom he was writing he gives what is the essence or practical side of repentance: "Be subject, therefore, unto God; but resist the devil and he will flee from you." Alas, how often this injunction is reversed in practical life, when men are subject to the devil but resist God! Herein lies the whole difference between a godly and a godless character. To whom are we subject? Whom do we resist? So often as we sin against light and knowledge, so often do we resist God. So often as we yield to the solicitations of our lower nature and are led away into sin, so often are we subject to the devil.

There is in every truly regenerate heart a desire for a closer walk with God. Many are asking, How may I come nigh unto God and into a more intimate and vital fellowship with Him? This is a most important question. James answers it in a very plain and satisfactory way. He says: "Draw nigh unto God and He will draw nigh to you." But if the question still recurs, to one who is conscious of being separated from God, as to how he may draw nigh to Him, James still furnishes the answer: "Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye double-minded; be afflicted and mourn and weep: let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heaviness. Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and He will exalt you."

This is very plain talk. There is no misunderstanding it. It is our sins that separate us from God. We must put away these sins. In order to do that we must have a deep sense of our demerit, of our guilt, of our unworthiness. This is what is meant by being afflicted and mourning and weeping. God wants us to be joyful and happy, but He knows there can be no pure joy and permanent happiness for the sinner until he has, in deep contrition of soul, turned away from his evil doings and sought forgiveness of Him. Let us humble ourselves in the sight of the Lord if we would be exalted.

Surely, this lesson calls us to a thorough and honest introspection of our own hearts and lives. Wherein we have erred let us make haste to repent, and to manifest it in a reformation of our conduct. So shall we obtain peace with God and with our own consciences. Let not this prayer-meeting close until each one present resolves to put away from his life everything that he knows to be contrary to the will of God.

PRAYER.

Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. We thank Thee that Thou hast called Thy erring children to repentance; that by Thy goodness and forbearance. Thou art leading us to repentance. We thank Thee for the gracious opportunity, when we have departed from the way of righteousness, to return thereto and to find forgiveness in Thee. Help us, we beseech Thee, to put away from our hearts and from our lives everything that displeases Thee, to the end that our fellowship with Thee may be close and vital, and that our lives may exert an influence to draw others to repentance and to Thee. In Christ's name. Amen!

Questions and Answers.

1. The Ladies' Aid Society of this church is arranging for a carnival or trade's review for the benefit of the church. There is nothing immoral in the play, or rather the advertisements. It has also given at other times bazaars and suppers for the same cause. Is it right for the church to resort to this method of raising money for the cause of Christianity?

2. Is it right for the church to ask the world to help it to advance the cause of Christ?

3. Is there any harm in social card-playing or dancing?

4. Is there any sacredness attached to the first day of the week beyond the meeting for breaking bread and the collections?

A. S. Farley.

1. We are compelled to make a distinction between what is sinful and what is inexpedient. We should not like to say that conducting trade's reviews, bazaars and suppers as a means of making money for the church, if honestly conducted, was sinful. Our experience and observation, however, lead us to believe in the unwisdom and inexpediency of resorting to such measures for raising money. It would be better for Christian people as individuals to make their money in honorable ways and give it directly to the church. The spiritual benefit of giving is lost largely in this indirect method of giving.

2. It certainly is not in good form, nor is it good principle, for the church to put itself in the attitude of a beggar at the feet of worldly men to solicit alms by which it may live and do its work. If, however, non-church members, of their own free will, offer their money for the benefit of the church, feeling that they are only giving in return for benefits they derive from the church, that is another matter. We see no objection to receiving such offerings.

3. These things lead to harm very often, and for that reason it would, in our judgment, be better to deny ourselves these forms of amusement for others that are not subject to this objection.

4. Yes, the first day of the week is kept in honor of Christ's resurrection from the dead. There should be a cessation of the usual labor, and the day should be devoted to religious uses. It should be a day of rest from physical toil and of spiritual recuperation.

In the last number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, in the editorial entitled "The Partisan Spirit," you speak of the "demonstrated truths of biblical criticism." Will you please state what are the "demonstrated truths" of which you were thinking?

Oscar E. Kelley.

Clinton, Ind.

What would be a demontrated truth to one man might not be to another. The revolution of the earth on its axis is a demonstrated truth of physical science to most people, but there are a few who yet insist that "the sun do move." The phrase quoted from our editorial was one supposed to be uttered by advanced biblical critics who claim that many things have been demonstrated to be true in biblical criticism which others of us yet hold as open questions. There are some things concerning which there is practical unanimity among biblical critics, but perhaps few of these would be universally accepted. On these doubtful questions the best we can do is to be guided by a concensus of the most competent judges on the matters in question.

1. Does it show the best wisdom for a preacher of the Christian Church to stand before an audience and say: "We are the Church. We are right in everything."

2. How comes it that infants were baptized so soon after the apostles died and received the support of such men as Justin Martyr, Irenæus, St. Augustine and others? J. S. S.

1. It certainly does not indicate any great degree of modesty to say the least. We should say that such expressions would indicate a zeal that was out of proportion to knowledge. Every preacher, of course, should be fully persuaded in his own mind that the position he occupies is right. At the same time, the man who knows most is likely to make the least claim to infallibility.

2. The doctrine of total hereditary depravity, or of transmitted guilt resting upon infants, which could only be washed away by baptism, is responsible, no doubt, for the early introduction of the practice of infant sprinkling. Since infants died, and since the stain of original sin, according to this theory, was upon them, and could only be washed away by baptism, nothing was more natural than that parents should desire their children to be baptized. With the passing away of this notion, which is now almost obsolete, infant baptism is losing its hold, and but for the parental instinct which associates in some way this custom with the child's religious training, the practice would soon be discontinued as wanting in scriptural authority. When it comes to be more generally understood that we may dedicate our children to God and train them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord without infant baptism, the usage will generally disappear, and children will be left to obey Christ in the ordinance of baptism for themselves.

I frequently hear members of our churches discussing the matter and propriety of state boards as applied to the government of our church organizations. Some say that it means the abolition or discontinuing of elders in the church, and the performing of their duties by the pastor of the congregation, and that it may lead to a division among us. Is there anything in this, and if so, what is it? I. E. Hodges.

Kell, Ill.

The state missionary boards, which are the only state boards that we have, have nothing to do with the local management of the churches. They are appointed by the state conventions, in which the churches are represented, for the purpose of receiving the funds appropriated by churches for mission work within the state and to appoint missionaries, superintend their work and report same to the state conventions. The abolition or discontinuance of elders is no part of their aim or work. It is time that the churches had all learned this much concerning our methods of mission work.

Current Religious Thought

Prof. W. D. MacKenzie, Chicago Theological Seminary, does not doubt the inspiration of the Bible, but thinks a new definition of the process greatly needed. In an interesting article in the Biblical World for April, "To One Who Fears that He Has Lost His Bible," he says:

I say "the founding of the Christian religion," but not its propagation as a permanent force and universal religion in the human race. For this it would seem that Scriptures were necessary. If, then, revelation first took place when in a great variety of ways the will and nature of God were disclosed to individuals, may there not be a sense in which inspiration can be applied to all those processes by which God secured the making of certain adequate records of his revelation and its influence, in order that future generations might live in its light, and experience its power? When we come to look closely at the Bible we find ourselves unable to define the form of this inspiration on account of the exceedingly various literary forms which are employed for this purpose, and the very evident secular influences which were often at work in the minds of the authors and editors who produced them. We have no evidence that God placed any writer in a position out of all relation to the habits and methods of other writers in his own generation. Indeed, it is one characteristic of the original process of revelation itself that God used as his instruments men who had many faults of disposition and character; and if he used imperfect and oftentimes unhallowed institutions or customs for manifesting his will it seems natural to suppose that, when it came to using literature for recording that manifestation, he would again, in his gracious condescension, employ the methods or the motives, however unworthy in some cases they might be, which swayed the general authorship of those times. The main fact before us is this: that under the providence of God we have contained in the Bible documents or forms of literature which were composed at various periods extending over a thousand years, and which all help to bring into clearness the substance of the one central and continuous historical revelation of God, and the historical circumstances amid which it broke from stage to stage upon man's view. This, in itself, is an unparalled and, to the sensitive soul, a most thrilling fact. The contemplation of such a providential guidance of scores of writers, and of the fortunes of so many pamphlets in their first inditement, in in their preservation, in their most strange selection and collection, irresistably suggests to thousands of the best minds that when they are all put together into this one book the writings verily deserve the name of the Book of God.

For my part, I utterly despair of ever seeing a definition of this process that shall include within it the varieties of providential leading which were all necessary to produce the result. Scarcely two writers can be named who claim to have received the Word of God in the same way, or to have written it for exactly the same purpose, or to have employed the same means to gather up, to arrange and to publish their material. How utterly foolish it must be to attempt to set forth a theory of inspiration which shall bring under one category all these varieties of authorship and publication, preservation and collection! Bet the astounding fact is there which gives them all life and makes them contribute to one end. Why fear that you have lost the Bible as long as it is certain that therein the wondrous process of the self-revelation of God is described?

In an editorial on "The Bible and the Press," in the Observer (Cumberland Presbyterian) of this city, dealing with the question of the historical criticism of the Bible, the editor says:

It matters not how many Presbyteries inveigh against the agitation, it is bound to go on. All attempts to suppress investigation must prove mortifying failures in the end. Let any intelligent man step into any first class bookstore and ask for the latest and most sought after book on the Bible, and in nine cases out of ten he will be shown some one of fifty or a hundred volumes produced by the men known as Higher Critics. The result of the inquiry will be all the same whether it be made in Germany, England or America. We are observing this work with the profoundest interest. In a movement like this it is natural that there should be much that is crude, immature, premature and unsafe, but out of the heated furnace there will come pure gold. Here and there are signs of a reaction. The most advanced scholars now concede that all or nearly all the books of the New Testament are genuine and that the traditional view, so far as their origin is concerned, is correct. The doctrine of verbal inspiration has been given up by nearly all scholars, and it is, we believe, universally conceded that the Bible does not teach science. All concede that the Bible is the greatest of all books, and that it is the world's best guide in religion. Let the people possess themselves in patience. There is no danger that anybody's soul will be lost by the study of the Bible. The work of destructive criticism, so called, is about over, and the period of constructive criticism has begun. Not one book of the Bible will be lost, but many of them will be differently interpreted. It is the duty of the religious press to place before the people in proper form the results of devout scholarship and not to be afraid of the truth. God has taken care of his people in all ages and he will not desert them now. It is infinitely better that the religious press should do this work than that it should be left to the secular press. The secular papers of the country are in the hands of men who know absolutely nothing of theology. Many of them take vicious delight in twitting the ministry with ignorance, narrowness and intolerance. It is nuts to them to have some half-educated preacher assail the Bible. Instantly he becomes a Solomon in wisdom and a cyclopedia in knowledge. The proper medium for the people to learn of the results of Christian scholarship is the religious press. The Observer has arrayed itself from the beginning on the side of prudent conservatism, and it sees no reason to depart from that course. We are not at all afraid to tell the people the conclusions reached by reverent and devout scholars.

The fact must be clear that there can be no growth in spiritual things without proper food, and that food is the Word of God, and nothing short of it can supply the need of the soul. The fact that so many apparently stand still in the Christian life may easily be accounted for when it is known that they habitually neglect to take the nourishment that God has provided, or they take it in such small quantities and so irregularly as to produce mere starvelings or sorrowful dyspeptics in the church.—*J. NINE DECADES OF HISTORY

THE TURBULENT PERIOD.—IV.

Controversial Questions Ab Intra.

W. T. MOORE.

It has been truly said that misfortunes never come singly; and it is equally true that great tests do not usually stand alone. When Satan made his assault upon our divine Lord, he did not retreat until he had been repulsed three times. Each one of the temptations was very severe, but when the final victory was achieved, then angels came and ministered to the weary Christ. In like manner Job was tried by at least two very severe tests. So it has ever been, and so it will probably ever be.

The period we have under consideration was full of danger to the Disciples' movement. It was a time of great testing. We have already seen how the war, with the many trying things associated with it, put to the severest strain the loving fellowship which had from the beginning of their movement distinguished the Disciples of Christ. We have seen also how they came out of that movement without any actual division having taken place in that body. But all the strain was not wholly on account of the war; nor was it simply between the Disciples North and South. The whole body, North and South, was more or less tested by

THE COMMUNION QUESTION.

It would be misleading to say that this question ever reached such an acute state as to seriously threaten a rupture between those who respectively held adverse views. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that it was the entering wedge of what might have been a serious schism if the Disciples' position had not been so strong, and if prudent counsels had not prevailed.

In pleading for a return to apostolic faith and practice, the Disciples had very properly emphasized the importance of giving baptism its legitimate place in the plan of salvation. They saw that it was impossible to make much headway with their plea for immersion and believer's baptism while the design of baptism was practically ignored. There were those who made too much of baptism—attached to it what was called "sacramental grace" and, consequently, these did not regard the salvation of any one as secure who, on any account, failed to receive the blessing of baptism.

There were others who made too little of baptism. They regarded it as practically nothing more than a bodily act by which the believer gave evidence to the world of his willingness to become a Christian, or as proof that he had already become a Christian. At most it was simply an "outward sign of an inward grace." But some of those who held to infant baptism did not attach even this much importance to the ordinance. It is difficult to state in language just what the position was that was held by this class. Indeed, the only thing necessary to state here is the fact that, no matter what the position was, it practically left the ordinance without any special significance.

The Disciples refused to accept either one of these views. They believed that there was a middle ground which was the safe ground. While they would not make too much of baptism; that is, would not give to it any "sacramental grace," or allow that by itself, ex opere operato, a change of heart was effected, they, nevertheless, held strongly to the notion that baptism, in New Testament teaching, is in someway unmistakably connected with the remission of sins; and, consequently, they proclaimed everywhere the importance of returning to scriptural teaching on this subject.

While the Disciples were generally agreed among themselves as to what the Scriptures really taught concerning the design of baptism, there was, during the period now under consideration, considerable diversity of views as to the practical consequences of their teaching on the subject. There were not a few who held strongly to the notion that restricted communion was the logical sequence of scriptural views as to the place which baptism should occupy in the return of the sinner to God. However, there were others, equally anxious to stick rigidly to the Scriptures, who did not believe that any such consequences followed the Disciples' view of the design of baptism, as was supposed by those brethren who leaned toward restricted communion.

LOGIC OF THE HEAD AND HEART.

Mr. Campbell's views had always been pronounced in favor of those who believed that the divided state of Christendom could not be successfully dealt with by insisting upon the rigid application of pure logic, even if it were possible to show that those who favored a strict construction could sustain their position by the Scriptures. He did not make mistakes of the head equal to those of the heart. This view of the matter is strikingly set forth in an article by Mr. Campbell, published in the Millennial Harbinger for 1837. The following extract will be sufficient for my present purpose. After defining who it is that is a Christian, and what is meant by a perfect man in Christ Jesus, he says:

But every one is wont to condemn others in that in which he is more intelligent than they; while, on the other hand, he is condemned for his Phariseeism, or his immodesty and rash judgment of others, by those that excel in the things in which he is deficient. I cannot, therefore, make any one duty the standard of Christian state or character, not even immersion into the name of the Father, of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and in my heart regard all that have been sprinkled in infancy, without their own knowledge or consent, as aliens from Christ and the well-grounded hope of heaven. "Salvation was of the Jews," acknowledged the Messiah; and yet, he said of a foreigner—an alien from the commonwealth of Israel, a Syro-Phenician—"I have not found so great faith; no, not in Israel."

Should I find a Pedobaptist more intelligent in the Scriptures, more spiritually minded and more devoted to the Lord than a Baptist, or one immersed on profession of the ancient faith, I could not hesitate a moment in giving the preference of my heart to him that loveth most. Did I act otherwise I would be a pure sectarian, a Pharisee among Christians. Still, I will be asked, How do I know that any one loveth my Master but by his obedience to his commandments? I answer, In no other way. But mark, I do not substitute obedience to one commandment for universal or even for general obedience. And should I see a sectarian Baptist or Pedobaptist, more spiritually minded, more generally conformed to the requisitions of the Messiah than one who precisely acquiesces with me in the theory or practice of immersion, as I teach, doubtless the former rather than the latter would have my cordial approbation and love as a Christian. So I judge, and so I feel. It is the image of Christ the Christian looks for and loves; and this does not consist in being exact in a few items, but in general devotion to the whole truth as far as known.

With me mistakes of the understanding and errors of the affections are not to be confounded. They are as distant as the poles. An angel may mistake the meaning of a commandment, but he will obey it in the sense of which he understands it. John Bunyan and John Newton were very different persons, and had very different views of baptism, and of some other things; yet, they were both disposed to obey, and, to the extent of their knowledge, did obey the Lord in everything.

There are mistakes with and without depravity. There are willful errors, which all the world must condemn, and unavoidable mistakes, which every one will pity. The apostle mistook the Savior when he said concerning John, "What if I will that John tarry till I come?" But the Jews perverted his words when they alleged that Abraham had died, in proof that he spake falsely when he said, "If a man keep my word he shall never see death."

Many a good man has been mistaken. Mistakes are to be regarded as culpable and as declarative of a corrupt heart only when they proceed from a wilful neglect of the means of knowing what is commanded. Ignorance is always a crime when it is voluntary; and innocent when it is involuntary. Now, unless I could prove that all who neglect the positive institutitions of Christ and have substituted for them something else of human authority do it knowingly, or if not knowingly, are voluntarily ignorant of what is written, I could not, dare not, say that their mistakes are such as unchristianize all their professions.

True, indeed, it is always a misfortune to be ignorant of anything in the Bible, and very generally it is criminal. But how many are there who cannot read; and of those who can read, how many are so deficient in education; and of those educated, how many are ruled by the authority of those whom they regard as superiors in knowledge and piety, that they never can escape out of the dust and smoke of their own chimney, where they happened to be born and educated? These all suffer many privations and many perplexities, from which the more intelligent are exempt.

The preachers of "essentials" as well as the preachers of "nonessentials" frequently err. The essentialist may disparage the heart while the nonessentialist despises the institution. The latter makes void the institutions of heaven, while the former appreciates not the mental bias on which God looketh most. My correspondent may belong to a class who think that we detract from the authority and value of an institution the moment we admit the bare possibility of any one being saved without it. But we choose rather to associate with those who think that they do not undervalue either seeing or hearing by affirming that neither of them, nor both of them together, are essential to life. I would not sell one of my eyes for all the gold on earth; yet I could live without it.

There is no occasion, then, for making immersion, on a profession of faith, absolutely essential to a Christian, though it may be greatly essential to his sanctification and comfort. My right hand and my right eye are greatly essential to my usefulness and happiness, but not to my life, and as I could not be a perfect man without them, so I cannot be a perfect Christian without a right understanding and a cordial reception of immersion in its true and scriptural meaning and design. But he that thence infers that none are Christians but the immersed as greatly errs as he who affirms that none are alive but those of clear and full vision.

THE INFLUENCE OF ENVIRONMENT CONSIDERED.

In presenting this view Mr. Campbell was careful to guard against the slightest suspicion that he would be disposed to compromise any teaching of the Word of God. He could not help recognizing the state of things around him.

He knew that the religious movement, of which he was perhaps the most distinguished leader, really had its origin among the Pedobaptists, and not Baptists. It was the outgrowth of an earnest and intelligent study of the Word of God with respect to the great fundamentals of Christianity. Mr. Campbell was himself at first a Presbyterian, and nearly all the eminent men associated with him had been Pedobaptists. It is not strange, therefore, that he was utterly opposed to surrounding the communion table with a sort of police arrangement by which all Pedobaptists should be excluded from participation in the Lord's Supper.

In this view of the matter Mr. Campbell was strongly supported by his co-editors of the Millennial Harbinger, W. K. Pendleton and Isaac Errett. During the year 1862 Mr. Errett wrote several articles on this question that may be justly ranked among the ablest he ever contributed to our literature.

A somewhat stricter view was advocated by Benjamin Franklin, then editor of the American Christian Review, George W. Elley, of Lexington, Ky., and others of note. However, the final conclusion reached, and which has been the theoretical position of the Disciples ever since, was that so far as Pedobaptists are concerned, we should "neither invite nor exclude them from the communion table." Mr. Franklin stated his own position in the following language:

> There are individuals among the sects who are not sectarians, or who are more than sectarians—they are Christians or persons who have believed the gospel, submitted to it, and in spite of the leaders been constituted Christians according to the Scriptures. That these individuals have a right to commune there can be no doubt. But this is not communinon with the "sects."
> Where is the use of parleying over the question of communing with unimmersed persons? Did the first Christians commune with unimmersed persons? It is admitted they did not. Shall we then deliberately do what we admit they did not do?
> When an unimmersed person communes without any inviting or excluding, that is his own act, not ours, and we are not responsible for it. We do not see that any harm is done to him or us, and we need no exclusive remarks to keep him away, and we certainly have no authority for inviting him to come.
> If it is to be maintained that "except a man be born of water and of the Spirit he cannot enter the kingdom of God;" that "as many of us as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ," as we have it in the Scriptures and that none were in the church or recognized as Christians in apostolic times who were not immersed, it is useless for us to be talking about unimmersed Christians, and thus weakening the hands of those who are laboring to induce all to enter the kingdom of God according the Scriptures.
> We have nothing to do with any open communion or close communion. The communion is for the Lord's people, and nobody else. But if some imagine themselves to have become Christians according to the Scriptures when they have not, and commune, as we have said before, that is their act and not ours. we commune with the Lord and his people, and certainly not in spirit with any who are not his people, whether immersed or unimmersed. We take no responsibility in the matter, for we neither invite nor exclude.

The position as stated in the concluding paragraph, with slight modifications as to the phraseology, was finally accepted by the Disciples generally, and has ever since been regarded as a fair statement of their views on the subject. It is probable, however, that they have not always been as careful in practice as this theory clearly suggests. Indeed, there has generally been very little need for care on the subject. For the most part there has been quite as little desire expressed by Pedobaptists to fellowship at the Lord's table with the Disciples as there has been with Disciples not to invite them. So far as practice is concerned, therefore, the whole discussion of the communion question was of little actual use, for it really seldom happens that Disciple congregations have any occasion for meeting the supposed emergency in a practical way.

As a matter of fact the whole subject was doubtless an importation. The Disciples' movement in England had early received large accessions from the Scotch Baptists; and these Baptists, being strongly wedded to restricted communion, brought with them their narrow views into the Disciples' churches. These Scotch Baptists soon became the ruling spirits in most of the churches throughout the United Kingdom, and the consequence was the whole movement, on the other side of the Atlantic, took on the severest type with regard to the communion question.

In the earlier days of the movement there was little or no friction among the churches on the question under consideration. But about the year 1862 some of the leading brethren in Great Britain began to grow restless as to the attitude of the American churches with respect to their fellowshiping Pedobaptists. Inquiries were accordingly made concerning the practice of the churches in America and this led to the discussion to which I have referred.

It is sufficient to say that there is now a practical unanimity on this question among the Disciples throughout the United States. Their view is to teach no hard and fast lines on the subject. They hold that it is the duty of all public teachers to declare faithfully the whole counsel of God, but having done this, it is not their duty to organize either a police force to protect the Lord's Supper from Pedobaptists or to insult them by practically telling them that their room would be more acceptable than their company. In short, Disciples teach that it is wholly inconsistent to sing with, as well as engage in any other acts of worship with Pedobaptists, and then refuse to allow them, on their own option, to take of of the Lord's Supper at Disciple meetings. Disciples are wholly unable to see how the one act of partaking of the Lord's Supper should become a test of Christian fellowship while all other acts, wherein there is co-operation, should count for so little.

Anyway, the communion question, so far as the Disciples themselves are concerned, was probably forever settled by the great discussion to which reference has already been made; and not the least happy reflection in connection with this matter is the complete failure of the Evil One to precipitate a division among the Disciples on this question.

"LAST OF ALL."

JASPER SEASTON HUGHES.

The cry of the "old Jerusalem gospel" is not free from fault. It takes too partial and exclusive account of things current at a single stage. It is too Petrine in spirit, just as the cry of "faith alone" is too Pauline. The cry, "Back to Christ," must consider him where he is freest from crude and prejudiced representations, and that place is in his own revelation of himself where he says, "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the faithful witness, the firstborn from the dead, the prince of the kings of the earth, the bright, the morning star." To declare his Sonship and his Messiahship was the most forward step, the climax of the gospel; to prove the Gentile's right to his mercies was the burden of the Acts and the Epistles, but to show his conquest of the world, his right to dominion over the kingdoms of men and the means and certainty of its accomplishment, was reserved for the last message through the last surviving apostle. Those who are looking for Christ to come in person to accomplish this owe their faith to an earlier and less perfect expression of Christianity.

The immediate coming of the Lord, found in the earlier writings, are not found in the later and still neglected writings of St. John. These are cleared of all the confusion about the destruction of Jerusalem and of the Jew and Gentile controversy about law and freedom and about faith and works. When we go "back to Christ" let us seek him in this clearer atmosphere.

The Gentiles received the gospel by its being driven out of Jerusalem in a persecution, but it did not lose its Jerusalem infirmities, but settled perverted in the city of Romulus, but that city respected Antioch and its apostle and drove them hence to be raised up in the Reformation, and the Reformation raising Christianity in its middle state as seen in Paul's great mission neglected, if it did not equally respect the last book, the chief corner stone, the highest and purest revelation of Jesus Christ through his reserved, his nearest, his bosom disciple, John, called Boanerges, who was a disciple first of the Baptist in the wilderness, whose spiritual foster mother was Mary, mother of Jesus—out of this rejected book God, I say, will raise up, as he raised his Son from the dead, the highest and purest conception of Christ and the Christ-life in the time to come.

"First the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear." "Ye shall see greater things than these." "Ye shall see heaven open and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man." "Greater things than these shall ye do." "The disciples did not understand this at first." "I did not tell you all this at first because I was with you." "Let him that hath an ear hear." It could not be plainer that the revelation was to be on a progressive scale, nor can we doubt that it rose to its highest in the vision of Patmos. There the Spirit seven times warns us to hear as the last word: "He was seen of Cephas [Peter], then of James, and last of all of me." Paul (at that time the last but much later and really last of all) was seen by John. The road from Jerusalem to Damascus found its spiritual terminus in Patmos.

Peter received an apocalypse of a wide-spreading sheet let down from heaven containing all kinds of animal life and creeping things, and to make Peter willing to receive the Gentiles he was ordered to rise, slay and eat." Paul received an apocalypse in which he was caught up to the third heaven, to paradise, and heard words to him unspeakable and unlawful for him to utter, afterwards to be revealed; but John—"what is it to thee if he tarry till I come"—John was given an apocalypse in which the door of heaven was opened and he bidden to "come up hither," and he went in and saw and heard "the things which are, the things which were, and the things which shall come to pass hereafter" from "him which is and which was and which is to come hereafter;" and he was commanded to write them in a book and to send them to the churches. That book contains seven open letters from Christ concerning things present and current, and seven sealed letters from the Father concerning things which "shall come to pass hereafter" and which the Lamb by the merit of having washed us in his own blood is enabled to open and to show to his servants. It opens with—"Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear and keep the words of the prophecy of this book." It closes with a curse upon him who shall take away from its teaching.

It has been contended that even Romanism was a blessing in the dark ages of heathen night, and it may be allowed that Protestantism has been a blessing in the dusky ages of papalism in the same way, but they are both fragmentary and partial, and "that which is in part shall be done away." They are as the law to the gospel. That which at one time is indispensable to the furtherance of the welfare of the world may at another time become an insurmountable obstacle to its progress.

So stood the law to the gospel; so stood Jerusalem and Peter to Antioch and to Paul in the middle of the first century; so stood Rome and the Pope to Wurtemberg and to Luther in the sixteenth, and so stand the Reformation and Paul to the Regeneration and to John at the opening of the twentieth century.

All that bright galaxy of noble and devoted scholars now enlightening Christendom with freshening floods of light come from the reddening sky whence the devoted exile of Patmos is rising into the ascendant to fill the world with the glory of the Lord and "the brightness of his coming." Prof. Richard Moulton says, "John's writings are the storm-center of modern controversy." Let those who seek the light turn with new heart to their closer study.

THE POWER OF GOD.

GEO. PLATTENBURG.

There are in the Scriptures two principles ever acting in irreconcilable antagonism. They are styled Flesh and Spirit. That these are at endless war, both experience and the Scriptures testify. "For the flesh," says Paul, "lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary one to the other; so that ye do not the things ye would." These are the sources of two wholly irreconcilable types of life, two distinctly antagonistic tendencies. One is "to be in," "to live in" and "walk after" the flesh; the other is to be in, live in and walk after the Spirit (Rom. 8:1, 8, 13). These tendencies have their necessary and irreconcilable issues. These issues are not arbitrarily fixed of God. They are the natural outcome of a life tendency produced by the one or the other of these principles. These activities are not compelled by a fatalistic necessity. They are the result of the voluntary determination of one's own faculties. Every man knows in his own experience the absolute truthfulness of Paul's words: "For as you have yielded your members servants to uncleanness and to iniquity unto iniquity, even so now yield your members to righteousness unto holiness." On either side the activity is self-determined. Here are the issues. "For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live" (Rom. 8: 13). Paul's law of the spiritual harvest distinctly asserts every affirmation hereinbefore given. The principle, the tendency and the issue. "For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting" (Gal. 6:7, 8). That sin is death, and that righteousness is life, is accepted and illustrated in the universal experience of the race. An example of this is found in the Iranian Dualism.

In the very beginning of the new life a word is used confirming this notion of movement, namely, conversion. The word carries with it the complex idea of turning from something to that which is its negation. We have thus, Acts 26:18, where Paul was "to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God." First of all, it is what Lange calls the soul's "ethical reaction against sin." Bus it is vastly more than this. It is the complete reversal of the whole life movement, the positive movement of the soul toward God. It can never mean less than this.

In the light of these statements we see how severely logical are the terms of Paul's fundamental proposition in his masterpiece of logic, the Roman letter: "The gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth it."

This great letter, more than equal to the sonorous splendor of Cicero or the terse majesty of Demosthenes, elaborates this brief but comprehensive thesis as its sole burden. Philosophically power is that which tends to or produces motion, and the motion produced is in the direction in which the force acts. The direction here is the soul's movement toward God, and in this direction the gospel solely acts. It may be profitable to see what in Paul's own mind constituted the gospel. In the solution of this letter (verses 1-4) we have:

1. That the gospel is God's. He is the Author of it. It is a part of a great purpose promised in prophecy. It is a forethought of the Infinite Mind, revealed in the fullness of the ages.

2. It is concerning his Son. To get the subject-matter well before the eye, Forbes' antithetic parallelism is here copied:

"Concerning his Son,
Who was born (son of man in weakness) from the seed of David,
As to the flesh.
Who was installed Son of God in power from the resurrection of the dead,
As to the spirit of holiness—
Even Jesus Christ our Lord."

There is a series of antitheses here, described as "ontological and historical." The first deals with the origin, nature, qualities or attributes of our Lord. The other with the historical manifestation and installation of Jesus as the Prince of the Messianic reign. It is to be noticed that there is "a double genealogy and history" in this pregnant passage. Born as to the flesh "indicates incontestibly his human nature." "Were he," says Dr. Hodge, "a mere man it had been enough to say that he was of the seed of David; but as he is more than man, it was necessary to limit his descent from David to his human nature." If, then, "as to the flesh" is intended to express his human nature, its antithesis, "as to the spirit of holiness," as certainly expresses his divine nature. If this be not so, what is the opposition of ideas in the two phrases? This interpretation is in perfect accord with the words of Matthew 1:20: "Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary, thy wife; for THAT WHICH is conceived in her is of the Holy Spirit."

In Phil. 2:6-8 Jesus is described as "existing in the form of God," then as "made in the likeness of men"—giving us the same "double genealogy." He was in the form of God before he revealed himself in the semblance of man. Are these opposing phrases equivalent? Do they express an identical nature? Why, then, does Paul begin verse 7 with an adversative "but" in affirming the Lord's existence "in the likeness of men?" His divinity was veiled by his voluntary humiliation, and therefore "God highly exalted him." So in Rom. 1:4, out of the resurrection of the dead he was historically manifested as the Son of God, the Founder of a new empire. Once more, this double genealogy is seen in Jno. 1:1, 14. In verse 1, "The Word was God." In verse 14, "The Word became flesh." Here the difference between "was" and "became" is to be noted.

3. The purpose of the proclamation. Paul declares: "By whom [Jesus Christ our Lord] we have received grace and apostleship, in order to bring about obedience to the faith among all nations for his name's sake" (Rom. 1:5). Dr. Schaff, while conceding that faith is used at times in an objective sense, that is, as expressing the thing believed (Quod credendum est), here puts obedience and faith in apposition, or in other words, the "obedience of faith" is merely "the act of believing." This is vastly more than doubtful. Meyer goes further, and denies that faith is ever used objectively. This is not true. Paul, in the letter to the Galatians, persistently uses "the faith" as the equivalent of "the gospel," and in positive contrast to "the law" as a system. In 1:23 it was said of him, "He which persecuted us in times past now preacheth the faith which he once destroyed." "The faith" of verse 23 and "the gospel" of verse 7, of the same chapter, are indisputably equivalents. Throughout chapter three "the faith" and "the law" are contrasted systems. He uses these words: "Before the faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed. Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, that we might be justified by faith. But after the faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster" (Gal. 3:23-25). Here two systems stand related to each as "before" and "after." Surely, Paul does not mean that faith as an "act of believing" came or was revealed "after" the law. This is absurdly untrue. If not, what of the noble company of men "before" the law? The "obedience of faith" is not merely the "act of believing," but it is that which finds its genesis in that act and its fulfillment in the soul's complete accord with the Word and will of Christ, revealed in the gospel, which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believes it. This is in harmony with the whole trend of apostolic teaching. Somewhere Mr. Addison says that the soul of man and God are like certain lines of the hyperbola—whilst they continually approach each other, yet they will never meet. The soul in its movement toward God, gaining new accessions of moral splendor age by age, continuously approaches, though it may never reach that superlatively exalted ideal of our blessed Lord: "Be ye perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."

THE NATURE AND EFFECTS OF CREEDS.

PROF. B. A. HINSDALE.

What the primitive Christian Confession of Faith was is not now, happily, a matter of dispute. The old theory that some of the creeds of a later day, as the Apostles' Creed, were composed by apostles, or at least originated in the apostolic age, has been abandoned by scholars, and it is held quite universally that a simple declaration of the Messiahship and divinity of Jesus Christ was the original symbol: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." For the Jew "Christ" might have been sufficient, but for the Gentile, for whom the Jewish title had no meaning, it was necessary to add, "Son of the living God." Such was the first Christian confession; and it will be instructive to glance at the process by which it was gradually set aside and the partially-expanded creeds of antiquity and the fully-expanded ones of modern times put in its place.

The creed-making process is mainly an exscinding, or at least a separating process, and is, therefore, negative in its effect. Those who frame and accept new creeds, no matter whether they write them out or not, strive, in so far as they are conscious agents to mark themselves off from other men making the Christian profession and bearing the Christian name. If they make these symbols the basis of new communions, they are necessarily separatists. This fundamental truth a little history will render plain.

Between the primitive symbol and such symbols as the Apostles' Creed there intervened this creed-form: "I believe in God, in Jesus Christ and in the Holy Ghost." This creed was made by putting the soul of the primitive symbol—the act of confession—into the body of the baptismal formula—Father, Son and Holy Ghost. Traces of it are found in the memorials of the ancient church. It was the first stage in the evolution of the multitudinous creeds of the historic church.

The second stage in the same process was the expansion of the articles of this tripartite form by the addition of successive increments, with a view of separating orthodoxy from heterodoxy. Thus, when the Gnostics made a distinction between God, the Father Almighty, and the Deminoge, or Creator of the world, the orthodoxy added, "Maker of heaven and earth" to the first article. And later, when the Eastern Church taught that the Holy Ghost "proceeded" from God the Father only, the Western Church added, "And the Son" (filio que) to the third article as framed by the Council of Nicea, making it read: "And in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father and the Son," etc. The history of creed-formation is one cumulative argument showing that such was the nature of the process; but these two examples will suffice for the present purpose.

The late Dean Stanley remarks upon the rythmical form of the Athanasian Creed: "It was a prose treatise composed in the rhythm of the Te Deum. It was not only 'the Confession of the Catholic Faith,' but 'the Psalm Quicumque Vult.'" "Every sentence is a verse and the whole is a triumphant pæan." The Dean mentions two theories as to the time and conditions of the appearance of this symbol; one, that it first started into general acceptance with the triumph of Clovis over the Arian Visigoths; the other, that it signalized the triumph of Charlemagne over the Byzantine power and says: "It may in this aspect be regarded as the war-song of the orthodox king or emperor, the hymn of victory over the defeated heretics. Wherever it is still read or sung this is probably the best aspect under which it can be considered—as a theological song of Deborah, rejoicing over the fall of the enemies, as it was once thought, of God and of the Franks, as Deborah and Jael rejoiced over the fall of the enemies of God and of Israel." Stanley found the main source of the life and power of this creed in its effect as chanted in the great cathedrals: "The grand crash of music drowns the dissonance of the jarring words and the burning vehemence, the antithetical swing of the sentences, is carried along on the wings of choir and organ till the sense of their particular meaning is lost in the spirit and rhythm of their sound."

The Athanasian Creed is an extreme example of the habit of mind in which the great polemical symbols have originated; but they are all the product of strife and contention, and most of them still pulsate with the life and feeling that gave them birth. They are polemicons, not eirenicons.

There is still another aspect under which these creeds may be viewed. They have rallied the conservatism of the communions standing upon them; they have become objects of hallowed association, and so have lived on long after the circumstances in which they originated passed away. Thus they not only mark the divisions and contentions in which they originated, but they preserve such divisions and contentions. There is mutuality of cause and effect. Division begets the creed, and the creed keeps alive the division.

The question of the legitimacy of creeds is not here raised for discussion. However that question may be viewed men are coming to see that expanded polemical creeds are by no means a source of unmixed good; that they were produced when the church was in an abnormal state, and that they tend to perpetrate that state; that Christian unity and creed-revision proceed from the eirenical spirit, and that, as the church as a unit assumes a normal position and life, the more necessary it is to return to primitive simplicity and comprehension.

This tendency of religious thought has been happily illustrated in the discussions of creed-revision in the Presbyterian Churches of Great Britain and the United States. For example, Dr. Marcus Dods, one of the most eminent Scottish theologians, has said: "It were worthy of any church to consider whether creeds used as terms of office have not done more harm than good, accentuating peculiarities and perpetuating inconsiderable distinctions; whether freedom of thought and the currents of public opinion are not more likely than the imposition of a creed to bring Christendom to a common recognition of the truth; whether a church is justified in holding a creed which cannot be expected to become the creed of the church catholic, thus dooming herself to everlasting sectarianism." The veteran scholar and teacher of the same communion, Prof. John Stuart Blackie, says of the members of the Westminster Assembly: "Am highly pleased that the points of agreement among them, even the minute points, were so numerous. The longer and more minute the document became, so much the better; for it indicated so much larger an agreement." He then points out that the very feature which made the Westmister Confession so acceptable to themselves rendered its general acceptance forever impossible. "Had the Westminster divines proposed," he argues, "to frame a symbol for every variety of the human race over the surface of the globe, we can hardly doubt that a document far shorter and simpler would have been the result."

The reasoning of Dr. Dods and Prof. Blackie cannot be answered. If men in great numbers are to be united for political or religious work broad platforms must be provided for them to stand upon. Moreover, the larger the number of planks put into the platform the narrower it is. History as well as theoretical reasoning shows most conclusively that lengthening the creed shortens the list of its subscribers. And it is one of the hopeful signs of the times that this fact is becoming clear to an increasing number of minds.

The more men reflect upon the gospel and its claim to an universal acceptance, the more will they appreciate its adaptation to the needs and conditions of men. This adaptation is seen in its appeal to the universal elements of human nature; in the small number and simple character of its rites and ordinances; in the simplicity of its ecclesiastical arrangements, and in the surrender of details of order, opinion and administration to the conditions of time and place. Apparent everywhere in the New Testament, this singleness of aim is nowhere more obvious than in the primitive Confession of Faith.

Our Budget.

—Missouri Sunday-school Convention, June 12-15, Plattsburg.

—This is the annual rally of our Sunday-school workers in Missouri, and it is always an occasion of enthusiasm and instruction in that important line of work.

—Now that the heated term is upon us, it will require a little extra zeal to keep up the work during the summer months. According to our day so shall our strength be.

—We are glad to hear good reports from Children's Day, and we feel sure that more schools will make their offerings this yeer than in any previous year. If your school has not yet joined the procession, see that it does so before June ends.

—The prayer-meeting, always a vital function of the church, is its main stay during the summer season. See that it is made interesting and profitable. Send for uniform topic cards if you have none.

—This is also the time of year that tries the mettle of the Enndeavor Society. Is its zeal proof against the languor of the summer months? We believe it will be. It also has added responsibilities during this season of year.

—All signs point to one of the largest Christian Endeavor Conventions at Detroit in July which has ever been held. Let the young people as far as possible arrange to attend and receive fresh inspiration for the work.

—The first number of The King's Business, by the new National Superintendent of Christian Endeavor, John E. Pounds, ably assisted by his wife, Mrs. Jessie Brown Pounds, seems to mean busines, and prophesies much good for the future of Christian Endeavor. It strikes a high note in its initial number, and we have no doubt but that this note will be maintained.

—Both religious and political gatherings are now in fashion throughout the country. It is no disparagement to the political gatherings to say that the issues which most vitally affects the welfare of the nation are being discussed in the religious gatherings rather than in the political, and the men who are dealing with these problems, though perhaps less known to fame, are not one whit inferior to our political leaders in their intellectual breadth and culture.

—It is a good time now, thus early in the preliminary stage of the political contest, for Christian men to be on their guard against being unduly swayed by party passion and prejudice. Let us be calm, dispassionate, reasonable, that we may discharge our duties in a way to promote the best interests of our country and of the kingdom of God.

—We call attention to our editorial elsewhere in this number, on the "Union of Temperance Forces," in which we try to point out the necessity for united action on the part of the friends of temperance and the friends of prohibition in order to accomplish more practical results in suppressing this form of legalized iniquity.

—Mrs. J. L. Stanford, widow of the late Leland Stanford, has recently deeded the bulk of her estate, valued at $10,000,000 to the Leland Stanford (Jr.) University. The only restrictions placed upon the transfer are that no buildings costing less than $6,000 shall be erected on the University campus, and that the number of female pupils be limited to 500. The United States can now boast of two very strongly endowed universities—the University of Chicago and the Leland Stanford, Jr. Just what effect the establishment of such gigantic institutions of learning as the two named will have upon the weaker colleges and universities of the states remians for the future to answer, definitely; but nothing serious need be feared. If some of the weaker ones die for want of patronage and support, the efficiency of those that remain will be greatly enhanced by the competition naturally excited. A better education at less cost is the coming opportunity of the young men of the next century, now at hand.

—The advance number of the Chautauqua Assembly Herald contains an elaborate program for the 1899 season at Chautauqua.

—Central Christian College, Albany, Mo., will hold a summer school from June 19th to July 29th, the announcement of which appears in the Central Christian Collegian for June.

—The Roman Catholic journals of this country are almost universally opposed to an Anglo-Saxon Alliance and lose no opportunity to stoutly oppose it. Any other course, however, for a Catholic journal would be the unexpected.

—Cards have been received at this office announcing the marriage of Mr. Daniel G. Silver and Miss Daisy Call in Mt. Cabanne Christian Church of this city, June 14th, at 7:30 P. M. The pastor of the church, D. R. Dungan, will solemnize the vows. Miss Daisy Call is the daughter of F. M. Call, business manager of the Christian Publishing Company.

—F. W. Collins, pastor Christian Church, Kellogg, Ia., has begun the publication of a local church paper called the Kellogg Christian. No. 2 of Vol. I. is just to hand and we are pleased to note the amount of good reading on its pages, especially the kindly reference to and remarks upon Mr. Campbell's article relating to the dedication of infants which we published some months ago. We hope Bro. Collins will find his paper of great help to him in his pastoral work at Kellogg.

—The seventh anniversary exercises of the Louisville Christian Bible School will be held June 8th in the Central Church in that city. Two orations, four sermons and two recitations are announced in the program besides music. This school is part of the home missionary work of the American Christian Missionary Society, and is under the immediate supervision of its Board of Negro Education and Evangelization. The next term will open Sept. 7, 1899.

—In the Coming Age for June Jas. L. Cowles has an article on "The Post Office the Citadel of American Liberty" that is worthy of a careful reading by every citizen of the United States. Mr. Cowels is the author of a bill introduced in the last Congress, both Houses, entitled "A Bill for the Establishment of a National System of Post Roads and for the Extension of the Post Office Department to Cover the Entire System of Public Transportation." Some of the changes proposed by this bill, stated in the article in the Coming Age, are startling in their nature, and yet we are evidently near the time when some of them shall be realized. Some of the things sought to be obtained by Mr. Cowels' bill are uniform fares for the same service, regardless of distance, uniform freight rates on the same basis and universal postal delivery. Four kinds of cars are contemplated for passenger service, for which the proposed fares are, respectively, 5 cents, 25 cents, $1 and $5. Under this system it will be possible for any one to cross the continent in any direction, by the payment of any one of these fares—if he has the time. The author thinks, furthermore, that free transportation for all possible under the new scheme, the government defraying all expenses by a general tax. A careful reading of the article will show that the writer is not simply dreaming. The facts cited show that these things are not only possible, but already in operation in part, in various ways and countries. On Jan. 1st, 1899, the penny post of England was extended to nearly all her colonies, and the substitution of mechanical motors for horse power on macadam roads makes possible the extension of the "traveling post office" to any part of the country. The freight rates under the system proposed are from two and a half cents per 100 lbs to $6 per can, per haul, regardless of distance. So dark as the clouds have been for the producer, et al, there is light ahead. The article referred to is prophetic of better things to come.

—The receipts for Foreign Missions during the month of May amount to $7,072.63; gain over May, 1898, $2,198.95. There was a gain in the receipts from the churches of over $1,900. The receipts to June 1st amount to $82,147.02, or a gain of $9,898.19. There has been a gain of $7,175.69 in the receipts from the churches as churches. See that the Children's Day offering is sent promptly to F. M. Rains, Treas., Box 384, Cincinnati, O.

—From the Missouri Herald we learn that a contract for the erection of a new building at Christian College, Columbia, Mo., costing $52,000 has been let and will be ready for occupancy by September in part and completed by Jan. 1st, 1900. The piano musical contest of Christian College this year resulted in a tie and a fine piano was given to both of the winners, Miss Ethel Dawson, of Butler, Mo., and Miss May Martyn, of Hartshorn, Indian Territory.

—A man named William Jack Haynes recently died at the Protestant Hospital at the reputed age of 112 years. He is said to have been the oldest member of the G. A. R. at the time of his death. He was for six years a member of Memorial Home this city. This remarkable span of life covers a remarkable period in the world's history and the larger portion of our nation's life. He was a well-preserved man physically and intellectually and enjoyed relating some of the many exciting times, incidents and experiences of his life to his friends.

—The editors of the Christian Worker, a religious journal of eight pages, published weekly at Kinston, N. C., announces its suspension with the issue of May 26th. The cause assigned is their inability to meet expenses for want of liberal patronage and prompt payment of subscription rates. The paper has been ably edited and was doubtless doing a good work in its field and we are sorry to learn of its demise; but church papers cannot live without adequate and appreciated support.

—H. A. Barnes, Tabor, Iowa, has a leaflet on the sinful waste of money in fireworks and other carnal pleasurs common to the celebration of our nation's birthday, which he is selling at remarkably low rates, for distribution. He does not oppose a suitable celebration of the day, but the waste and wickedness associated with it. The distribution of a good tract on this subject will do no harm and perhaps much good.

—We publish in our obituary department, this week, a lengthy but worthy tribute to the memory of Jacob Hugley, who recently departed this life at his home in Paris, Mo. Bro. Hugley was one of Missouri's purest men and most faithful preachers, and his departue will be felt by a wide circle of friends and brethren theoughout the state. The widow and children have our sympathy in this bereavement.

—The King's Business is the name of a new periodical, mothly, edited by J. E. and J. B. Pounds, Indianapolis, Ind. The June number, Vol. I., No. 1, is an excellent number. The leading article is the first part of a story by Jesse B. Pounds, whose popularity as a story writer is alone sufficient to insure a wide circulation for this journal. There are other ably written articles by well-known writers in this number. The object sought in this journal is implied in its title, the King's Business. We congratulate its editors on the taste, spirit, purpose and ability of their first number and wish them the most abounding success.

—The Secretary of War has ordered that there shall be no more burials of soldiers at sea. An expert embalmer will accompany each transport to and from Manila.

—The Bulletin, issued weekly by the Christian Church in Colorado Springs, Col., Dr. B. B. Tyler, pastor, is as neat, practicable and comprehensive as any we have yet seen.

—A glance at our Personal Column this week will show that our preachers were in great demand for memorial sermons and orations this year.

—Announcements of the commencement of Carr-Burdette College, Sherman, Texas, June 4-7 and of LaSell Seminary, for young women, Auburndale, Mass., June 8-14 have been received at this office.

—Mrs. G. R. Dill, of Belvidere, Neb., prepared and read before the fifth district missionary convention, held at Crete, Neb., May 16th, an excellent paper on "What are we Doing for the Sunday-school and for Humanity?" The paper is a strong appeal to greater diligence in the religious training of children. If space permitted we should be glad to publish the paper in our columns.

—The Nebraska C. W. B. M. desires every preacher in that state to present the interests of their work to their respective congregations in a sermon. No offering is asked, but new names to the organization, subscriptions for the Tidings and Junior Builders solicited. The board will furnish literature. Address Mrs. Minnie G. Hines, Lincoln, Neb.

—W. H. Waggoner, Eureka, Ill., besides being a specialist in missions, is a genuius in map-making. He has prepared a missionary map on muslin, about 9 x 6 feet, showing all the mission stations of the C. W. B. M. at home and abroad. A circular accompanies the map and explains it. It will be of great interest to the auxiliaries in holding their meetings. The price of the map is $5, and the proceeds go into the work of missionary institutes which Bro. W. is holding.

—We have a letter from Chas. F. Oneal, Midland, ———, concerning Y. P. S. C. E. pledges for the Salt Lake Church building, but in what state this Midland is the writer does not state. As there are nearly a dozen states with a Midland we have no means of knowing in which state the writer's Midland is located. If Bro. Oneal will send the state from which he writes, we will publish the article as requested.

—The installation service in connection with the formal inauguration of Bro. Tyrrell as pastor of the First Christian Church in Chicago, which took place on last Lord's day afternoon in the building the church now occupies at 30th St. and Indiana Ave., was one of the most helpful and inspiring occasions in the history of the Disciples of Christ in that city. A large audience was present, embracing representatives of our different churches in the city and suburbs, together with their preachers. The auditorium of the church was beautifully decorated with flowers and the national colors. An excellent musical program added to the enjoyment of the occasion. Bros. Cantrell, Brown and Gates participated in the introductory exercises. The editor of this paper, acting as chairman, made some general remarks touching the nature and importance of the occasion, and introduced J. H. O. Smith, who gave the charge to the congregation in one of his most happy and effective speeches. H. L. Willett was then introduced, who delivered the charge to the preacher, holding up a very high ideal of the Christian minister, and making us all to ask: "Who is sufficient for these things?" The chair then called on Bro. E. W. Darst to represent the score of other ministers of Chicago present in a few words of welcome in their behalf, which he did in his happy and earnest manner. In coming forward to respond to the words of welcome Bro. Tyrrell was received with the Chautauqua salute—the waving of handkerchiefs. At the close of his earnest and enthusiastic address the audience could only express its appreciation in a round of hearty applause. The Doxology and the closing prayer completed a service which will long be remembered by our brethren in the city of Chicago. The spirit of unity, of brotherly love and of enthusiasm was most inspiring. The congregation, which numbered only 45 when Bro. Tyrrell entered upon his work a few weeks ago, now numbers 104, and there are almost constant additions. The new church starts out under the most favorable auspices and we believe has a bright future before it. The only circumstance that marred the full enjoyment of the occasion was the very serious, and it is feared, mortal illness of Bro. Devore, one of the leaders of the new church. He was specially remembered in the prayers. The editor's brief sojourn in the happy Christian home of Bro. and Sister Bowman was most delightful, and the Monday morning's meeting in one of the parlors of the Palmer House, with more than a score of the Chicago ministers, was a most enjoyable occasion.

—A beautiful tribute to the memory of Mrs. S. M. Jefferson, who died at Berkely, California, May 9th, written by E. L. Powell, will appear in our next issue.

—We have just learned that the contest for the presidency of the Colorado State Agricultural College has been decided by the election of B. O. Aylesworth, of Denver, to that office. There is a handsome salary connected with the position and we congratulate Bro. Aylesworth on his election to the position. We are glad to see our preachers coming into the high places of the states to a share of which by religious association and influence as well as by scholarship they are justly entitled.

—At the twenty-sixth National Conference of Charities and Corrections, held in Cincinnati a few days ago, a most interesting address was made by George Torrence, superintendent of the State Reformatory, on "The Relation of the Cigarette to Crime." We quote the following concerning it from a special dispatch in one of our own dailies:

After reciting his own experience with boys coming to his institution Mr. Torrence said: "I am sure cigarettes are destroying and making criminals of more of them than the saloons."

In his reformatory now there are 278 boys. "Of 63 averaging 12 years of age, 58 were cigarette smokers. Of 133, averaging 14 years of age, 125 were cigarette smokers. Of 82, averaging 15 years, 73 were cigarette smokers. This demonstrates that 92 per cent. of the whole number were cigarette fiends at the time of committing crimes for which they were committed to the reformatory."

The general discussion developed a similar experience with others connected with reformatories for boys.

In view of these facts, which are indisputable, what is the plain duty of our lawmakers in reference to the manufacture and sale of this, one of the latest and vilest of Satan's inventions? We need not ask what is the duty of parents, teachers and other guardians of children. The saloon has no better ally in the world than the cigarette manufacturer, so that in addition to being a direct promoter of crime it is also a promoter of the drink habit, which is a prolific source of crime.

—B. C. Stephens, of Marceline, Mo., after a tour of six months in Northwest Missouri, reports on some of the conditions met which are too common in other places and states than the district named. These are, the absence of Sunday-schools, Endeavor Societies, midweek prayer-meetings and regular Lord's day worship in many of the country churches. He thinks the monthly meeting (preaching) plan only inefficient but does not put all the blame on the preacher for the trouble. He thinks some young preachers more capable of better work than one who preaches on Sunday and farms or does some other business through the week. He attributes the conditions complained of in part, with some churches, to a lack of religion. Probably the lack of religion is also attributable largely to a lack of more if not of better preaching. There are some country churches which are better able to have preaching every Sunday than are some city churches and will not be guiltless at the judgment for their negligence and selfishness. And certainly there is no church too poor to support a Sunday-school, Endeavor Society and a prayer-meeting; at least not many. There is large room for improvement along these lines with many of our country churches.

—At the Central Christian Church in Salt Lake City, Utah, an audience crowding the house listened to an eloquent memorial sermon by the pastor, W. H. Bagby.

—According to figures given by William E. Curtiss in a recent number of the Chicago Record it appears that the people of Germany and Switzerland are better educated than those of any other nation and those of the North Atlantic States better than those of any other section of America. The figures for Germany and Switzerland given are 0.11 and 0.50 per cent. of the populations. The average illiteracy of the United States according to this author is given as 13.3 per cent. of the population. That of other nations as follows: Roumania 89, Portugal 79, Russia 70, Spain 68, Greece 45, Italy 38, Hungary 28, Ireland 17, Austria 13.80, Belgium 13.50, France 5.50, England 5.80, Netherlands 5.40 and Scotland 3.57. If these figures are reliable they afford food for reflection.

—J. P. Cochrane, Pueblo, Col., has prepared a chart for the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, which is as handsome a thing in the way of pen-work as one often sees. Not only is it artistically done, but the conception is even more meritorious. The outline is that of a vast temple, and the two main pillars are marked "Prophets" and "Apostles." "Alpha" is marked on one of the corner stones that support the pillars. An open Bible is at the top of the chart, and underneath that is the arch of the temple, composed of seven stones bearing the names of the seven churches mentioned in Revelation. Underneath this are the words "Christ" and "Omega." Then comes a historical statement concerning the date of the origin of the C. W. B. M. and a blank for the auxiliary society. Beneath this still are appropriate passages of Scripture. It is no doubt a work of love, as well as of art. We are grateful to the author for a copy of this chart, and it adorns one of the walls of our office, where it may be inspected by our visitors.

—Of the many eloquent speeches made on Decoration Day, as the flowers were being scattered, over the graves of our soldier dead, we have seen nothing superior to the speech of Henry Watterson, editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal. The following is an extract:

Great as were the issues we have put behind us forever, yet greater issues still rise dimly upon the view.

Who shall fathom them? Who shall forecast them? I seek not to lift the veil on what may lie beyond. It is enough for me to know that I have a country and that my country leads the world. I have lived to look upon its dismembered fragments whole again; to see it, like the fabled bird of wondrous plumage upon the Arabian Desert, slowly shape itself above the flames and ashes of a conflagration that threatened to devour it; I have watched it gradually unfold its magnificant proportions through alternating tracks of light and shade; I have stood in awe-struck wonder and fear lest the glorious fabric should fade into darkness and prove but the insubstantial pageant of a vision; when, lo, out of the misty depths of the far-away Pacific came the booming of Dewey's guns, quickly followed by the answering voice of the guns of Sampson and Shafter and Schley, and I said: "It is not a dream. It is God's promise redeemed. With the night of sectional confusion that is gone, civil strife has passed from the scene, and, in the light of the perfect day that is come, the nation finds, as the first fruit of its new birth of freedom, another birth of greatness and power and renown.

—Mark Twain's plan for absolute, universal, permanent peace—to exhaust all the oxygen in the atmosphere—which he submitted to Secretary Hay, is susceptible of various meanings. It might be taken as a huge burlesque on the undertaking of the Peace Conference at The Hague, or it might be in the nature of a suggestion to that conference that in due time increased armament of the nations will naturally result in absolute peace — the peace of death by bullets, taxes and starvation.

—The Christian Orphan School of Missouri closed its scholastic year Thursday night. The work done the past year has been especially good in every department, reflecting great credit upon President Jones and his corps of teachers. The Christian Orphan School is second to none in the state, and with almost exactly the same teaching for next year, it is safe to predict that the '99-1900 term will be even better than any previous year.—The Fulton Sun.

James Shannon, LL.D.

We present to our readers this week, on our first page, the likeness of one of the eminent preachers and educators of Missouri, James Shannon, LL.D., and in the absence of a sketch which his son, R. D. Shannon, was to furnish, but which we have not yet received, we publish the following sketch of his life found in "The Dawn of the Reformation:"

"One of our most eminent men was born in the north of Ireland on the 22d day of April, 1799. From childhood, his parents who were truly pious, instructed him in the truths of God's Word, and at a very early period of life, they made a deep impression on his heart. At the age of thirteen years he resolved to devote his life to the proclamation of the gospel, and immediately commenced a laborious preparation for the work. He entered the Royal Institution of Belfast, Ireland, in the fall of A. D. 1815, graduated in May, A. D. 1818, and completed his theological course in A. D. 1820. The next fifteen months of his life he spent as 'First Assistant' in the 'Antrim Academy.' While thus occupied, he accepted the rectorship of an Academy in the United States, located at Sunbury, Georgia. There for the first time he witnessed a baptism by immersion, and soon began to doubt the validity of his own. Deeply realizing the truth, that we can not retain God's favor without sincerely endeavoring to know and do our whole duty, he at once entered upon a thorough examination of that subject. At the close of it he was immersed, and became a member of the Baptist Church. This occurred in the spring of A. D. 1823. In April, A. D. 1824, he became pastor of the Augusta Baptist congregation, as successor to William T. Brantley, D. D. During the following winter, a revival commenced through his instrumentality, extended throughout the state, and resulted in ten thousand additions to his adopted church. In January, A. D. 1830, he was appointed professor of Ancient Languages, in the State University at Athens. Thence he was called in the fall of A. D. 1835, to the presidency of the College of Louisiana, at Jackson. In A. D. 1840, he became the president of Bacon College, at Harrodsburg, Kentucky.

"Uniformly acting on the principle of proving all things, and holding fast that which is good, he had no sooner connected himself with the Baptists than he began to subject their tenets to the most rigid scrutiny, and to point out at their associations and other large meetings, wherein they differed from the Word of God. At the state convention held in Morgan County, A. D. 1834, he spent an hour and a half in endeavoring to convince a congregation of five or six thousand people that, according to the terms of the only commission under which they considered themselves authorized to preach the gospel, as recorded in Mark 16th chapter and 16th verse, they had no more right to offer men salvation on the ground of faith, without baptism, than on that of baptism without faith; and that to disjoin what God had so expressly united was, to the highest degree, impious. The substance of this discourse was afterwards published in the Christian Preacher under the title 'How to be Saved.'

"Not being allowed by the Baptists of Louisiana the same religious freedom which had been cheerfully accorded to him in Georgia, he was 'compelled in A. D. 1836 to organize a congregation on the principle of making the Word of God alone the rule of faith and practice.' In A. D. 1850 he exchanged the presidency of Bacon College for that of the University of Missouri. During his connection with the latter its patronage was more than doubled. The former, though unendowed, was sustained for ten years mainly through his influence. Upon his removal the trustees relinquished its collegiate organization. Though unanimously re-elected to the presidency of Missouri University in A. D. 1856, he could not conscientiously accept the situation in consequence of some restrictions in regard to their religious privileges, under which its officers had been placed by the preceding legislature. The board of trustees then passed a series of highly complimentary resolutions, and conferred upon him the honorary title of LL. D. He had been previously honored by that of D. D., by the University of Georgia. With such antecedents, had his life been spared, his high intellectual and moral endowments and elegant accomplishments would have justified the most brilliant anticipation on the part of his friends; not only with reference to his own future, but also that of the institution over which for some years previous to his death, he had the honor of presiding."

Some Strictures from President McGarvey.

In the last number of the Christian Standard, in the department of Biblical Criticism, Bro. McGarvey indulges in a few characteristic criticisms on the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. This is a way Bro. Mc. has of doing. As he enjoys it, and it does us no particular harm, we see no reason why the practice should be discontinued.

In an article entitled "Dangers to Religion" he says: "An editorial in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of May 11th aims to depreciate the danger to the cause of religion from the new phases of higher criticism." We say that is a characteristic criticism. Why should the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST "aim" or desire "to depreciate the danger to the cause of religion from the new phases of higher criticism," or from any other source? Is he an enemy of religion? Is he seeking to call the attention of the brethren away from the real source of danger so that the enemies of religion may get in their work to the best advantage? Naughty fellow! Why did not the president of the Bible College simply say, "The editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST underestimates, in our judgment, the danger to the cause of religion from the new phases of higher criticism." That would have probably been a correct statement. The one he did make is certainly not correct, for we have no desire whatever "to depreciate the danger to the cause of religion" from any source. The aim of the editorial to which our critic refers was to show that undue attention was being given to the danger from higher criticism to the neglect of other and graver perils which confront religion. We admitted that there was some danger from extremists among the higher critics, but our point was that there would be a much greater danger in refusing the fullest and freest investigation of all historical questions relating to the Bible. There is danger in eating, but it would be unwise to advise abstention from food on that account.

In the same department, in a brief article entitled "A Conversation on Liberty," Bro. McGarvey quotes again from an editorial in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST a paragraph describing an unfair, unjust and unprofitable kind of criticism in which brethren sometimes indulge, and then adds: "This is very well so far as it goes, but there is another supposable case. Suppose that the article in question did seek to introduce 'a revolution in religious thought' that would and must, if received, overthrow faith in the Bible. Suppose that it contained certain words and phrases which, without distortion, were justly subject to ridicule, and gave good ground for suspicion of heresy; what then?"

Well, in such an event as that it would be entirely proper for any one having the ability to do so to reply to and refute the article in a straightforward, manly way, showing the flaws and fallacies in the argument, and appealing to reason and to truth instead of to prejudice or to passion. That is the only way to "convict gainsayers." But the trouble is that a shepherd who is always crying "wolf!" "wolf!" when only an honest sheep is seeking to graze in fresh pastures, is not liable to attract the serious attention that he should when the real wolf does appear, whose aim is to devour and scatter the flock.

We have never uttered a word against the policy or principle of refuting errors that any brethren may have fallen into. We have had occasion very often in our editorial career to do that very thing, unpleasant as it is. We have always tried, however, to proceed on the principle that the man whom we were criticising was as honest in his convictions and as pure in his motives as we were, and our aim has been to appeal to reason and argument instead of to party feeling and prejudice. It is the latter kind of criticism we were condemning in the paragraph quoted from our editorial, and not the former.

English Topics.

VICTORIA THE GREAT.

Only one great topic fills the mouths of Londoners this week. The Queen's 80th birthday is creating a revival of royal enthusiasm, such as even excels the two sensations of the Jubilee in 1877 and the Diamond Jubilee in 1887. For many years the dear old Queen has not seemed so hearty, so cheerful and so pleased to appear in public as now on her return from the Riviera. In consideration for her advanced age the authorities have wisely refrained from arranging any great processions, but Her Majesty's movements have been affectionately followed by vast crowds. Multitudes of the younger generation have never caught sight of the Sovereign, and immense numbers of these have been attempting to seize the rare opportunity afforded by her appearance at Kensington Palace, the stately and beautiful old house where she was born. Some of us begin really to hope that this wonderful evergreen old lady may live to celebrate the 70th anniversary of her reign. That, however, is hardly possible; but, meanwhile, Victoria continues to increase her hold on the hearts of all classes in the empire. Of all the queens in history she is the very greatest in the supreme quality of character. She has ruled in the majesty of goodness, and history will lay at her feet the tribute of its most honorable verdict, that she has taught the whole race that the grandest sovereignty is that which wins the hearts of men by righteousness in high places, rather than by selfish dominance and arrogant autocracy. In England we never think of ourselves as being ruled over by royalty. The Queen has been content to reign, but has never attempted to rule in the assertion of her own will. The greatest influence in the universe is perfect obedience to law, and Queen Victoria has set the whole of her empire the example of constant obedience to the constitution. She is now reaping her reward, for she is the only aged monarch living in the world who enjoys both power and peace of mind. God save the Queen!

DEATH OF THE GREAT SUNDAY PAPER.

The fiercest fight of late years for any great principle is over. A few years ago the proprietors of the New York Herald tried the experiment of establishing a London edition on the seven-days plan. It exicited vehement opposition throughout the land and it was an ignominious failure. Two of the greatest firms in London, the publishers of the Daily Telegraph and the Daily Mail, forgetful of the significant lesson then administered, recently launched a Sunday edition of their journals, in competition with each other. Never has there been such furious excitement. I have already mentioned in these letters the uproar in the churches and in the press which has arisen. I have never seen anything to compare with it. Now I have thankfully to record that the Sunday Daily Mail is dead, and that the other journal is issuing its seventh edition on Saturday night. The attitude of the two firms seemed for weeks to be utterly defiant, but they mistook the temper of the British people, and they also entirely deluded themselves when they acted on the idea that Christianity was practically an extinct force in these islands. Sunday is still a cherished institution as a national day of rest with this people, and this extraordinary episode has amply demonstrated to sceptics and Mammon worshipers that the greatest power in existence in the community, however dormant it may normally seem to be, is the force of religious opinion. If only the whole latent spiritual energy of all the churches could be stirred and brought to bear in concentrated impact on any one of the evil institutions of our community, such systems as the drink traffic would be smashed and pulverized into shapeless dust which would not bear even the shabby monumental semblance of a decent wreck!

THE HOUSE IN THE WOOD.

Well, the Tsar has had his way. The Peace Conference is gathered in the "House in the Wood" at the Hague. What a sweet spot for the assembling of the messengers bearing their international olive branches! How many a traveled European and American must be picturing in the mind by the help of memory the scenes of that lovely royal city of Holland, with its quaint Old-World mansions; its lovely old hotels, like mediæval palaces themselves, such as the Old Doelen; its neighboring seabathing village of Scheveningen; its Rathhaus, with the grim old torture-chambers of the hellish Iniquisition; its lakelets in the square, and its delicious forest, embowering the "Huisten Bosk" in which the delegates are meeting! We have sent our British representatives, the chief being Sir Julian Pauncefote, whom the American people so intimately know, for he has left your shores purposely to attend the Tsar's conference. Will this conference help to perpetuate peace? I hope it will; I think it should; but I believe it will not! This is a sad conclusion; at least it saddens me all the more because I am by nature one of the sunniest of optimists, and tend irrepressibly to look at the bright side of everything.

THE GREAT DELUSION.

I feel bound frankly to say that from all that I have, during many years, seen of Europe in all quarters of the Continent, I have not a particle of hope of lasting peace, but only an expectation of the slight postponement of war. A stupendous break-up is inevitable; but it may be staved off by diplomacy for a time. Never was the world taken more sharply by surprise than when the Tsar, above all men, proposed universal cessation of increase of armaments. Never was there a greater mockery than when, on the eve of the conference, the noble Finns were outrageously deprived of their autonomy. The Government of Russia makes duplicity its constant keynote. The Russians are a noble race, but their government is wholly and utterly incorrigible. The young Tsar is like the young Emperor of China, a born reformer doomed to suffer for the fault of being born before his time. A gentleman in the British admiralty remarked to me recently that neither the British people nor the world at large can form any idea of the magnitude, the strength, the resources and the efficiency of the British navy, and that some day the whole world will experience a shock of unspeakable surprise, whenever some rash enemy compels England to put forth the power of her naval arm. Now, it is not to be expected that Britain can really reduce her one great line of defense, in face of the possible evil combinations which are only too deeply feared by those who know something of what is really going on in Continental circles. The wicked concert of Europe which prevented the appalling Turk from reaping his just punishment, and allowed the Sultan for three years to baptize himself once a week in a fresh bath of Armenian blood, did not establish the true conditions of lasting peace, but sowed the seeds of awful war in the future. The Tsar and his ministers were guilty of complicity with the fiend who still squats by the Bosphorus, and God will require from them and other accessories in wholesale murder and rapine an account of their awful crime. Nations have their punishment in this world, and they cannot escape it by prating of peace, when peace seems to them to be the only politic and profitable pursuit. Even the London Times, which usually goes passively with every fashion of the moment, expects little or nothing from the conference. The breach of faith with Finland has shocked the conscience of Europe, and as that conscience is not a very tender one, that breach must be regarded as specially flagrant.

The Amen! of marriage is always a baby. Without it, wedlock is a summer field that never blooms, a flower that never buds, a night without stars, a sermon without a benediction, a prayer without an Amen.

There never was a husband worthy of the name, who did not aspire to be the father and the grandfather of healthy, capable children to hand down his name and the fortune accumulated by the sweat of his brow, from generation to generation. There never was a wife fit to bear that noble title, who did not wish to wear womanhood's most glorious crown, the sceptre of motherhood. Thousands of wedded couples, otherwise happy, fall short of wedlock's greatest happiness because they are childless. In the majority of cases, this is because the wife, through ignorance or neglect, suffers from weakness and disease of the organs distinctly feminine. For women who suffer in this way there is one great medicine that does not fail to accomplish its purpose. It is Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It acts directly on the delicate organs concerned and makes them strong, healthy, vigorous, virile and elastic. It allays inflammation, heals ulceration, soothes pain and tones the shattered nerves. It fits for wifehood and motherhood. It quickens and vitalizes the distinctly feminine organism. It banishes the maladies of the expectant months and makes baby's introduction to the world easy and almost painless. It insures the little new-comer's health and nourishment in plenty It is the best supportive tonic for nursing mothers.

Mrs. Jennie Parks, of Marshall, Spokane Co., Wash., writes: "I am glad to tell of the good results of your great medicine,—Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. I was benefited by your medicine in confinement. It gives me strength. I have no tired feeling and my baby is the picture of health. I feel better than I have in ten years."

In cases of constipation Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets should be used as an adjunct to the "Favorite Prescription," they are extremely simple, perfectly natural and insure prompt and permanent relief.

THE FARCE OF THE ARCHBISHOPS.

A few clergymen have been flinging the Church of England on to the horns of a dilemma. The practice of burning incense is increasing, and so are the processionals, together with the celebration of mass. The Bishops do not know what to do, especially with a few of the more defiant of the clergy, who plainly say that they will not submit to the interference of either bishops or Parliament in matters of conscience. The Archbishops of Canterbury and York have hit on a new device. They have held a court of inquiry for hearing cases of dispute. For more than a week, with no less than 17 lawyers and experts, the "Archbishops' Hearing" has been proceeding, simply on the question whether incense may be offered in the Church of England. The whole problem depends on whether incense was permitted after the Reformation or not. Nobody seems really to know, and all the learning has so far been expended in vain. But several of the clergy have already signified that the finding of the archbishops, if there should be any, would make no difference, and the Archbishop of Canterbury has frankly stated that in reality he has not constituted a court at all, for its decisions would not be binding on any but those who chose to pay respect to its verdict on any point.

Evangelist Shi.

There still lingers in the mind the pleasure of an event occurring as we journeyed toward Chu Cheo, our future home. We had just passed through a little hamlet when suddenly we came face to face with a man, dressed as a teacher, with a face dark and tanned as a coolie's, strong yet gentle appearing, traveling on foot. We jumped down from our donkeys and horses, with exclamations, "It's Shi Sien Seng" (Mr. Shi). He was on his way to Nankin to welcome Bro. Arnold, who had just returned from England to take up the Chu Cheo work. Bro. Shi had but recently returned from Lu Cheo fu, Bro. A.'s old station, and with a characteristic Chinese expression told him "the whole city is as one pair of eyes looking for your return." This man has held the Chu Cheo station all the past summer, made vacant by the death of Bro. Saw and the return of Bro. Hunt to England on furlough.

In this land where heathenism has permeated all social and business relations, literary thought and language, and every act and desire of all classes, it becomes difficult for one born and bred in such an atmosphere to turn his back upon idolatry and not carry the manners of thought and expression into the Christian life. But if any of the Chinese Christians have been able to rise above this universal domination, certainly Mr. Shi has.

He is now 54 years of age, quite strong and very active, yet more or less broken by the former years of bondage to the opium habit. He was born and reared in the country, but after the Taiping rebellion stored his mind with facts and incidents of Chinese history, and using his natural ability as an orator and license of imagination, became a story teller. That same power with which he used to fascinate an audience on the street or in some open place, as with drum and rattles, in rude rhyme or vivid word-picture he told of the deeds of some Chinese hero is now used with great power in the service of Him whose love has constrained this man. A copy of Mark's Gosgel fell into his hands in those days, and its stories of Christ were told along with others in his vocation. That which he wished to use to catch his hearers caught him instead, and he came to the feet of the Master.

Knowing that as long as he used opium he could not follow Christ, he tried to break off the habit, only to find its power over him so great as to drag him back again and again. Finally, he came before God in prayer and fasting for power to overcome, and power came. Dr. Macklin, of Nankin, baptized him, and advised him to go back to his home at Yu Ho Tsz and tell his friends.

He had accepted Christ so completely and had found such happiness that his great desire was to share it with others. Through ridicule, coldness and persecution he preached on in his own village until he won them. They built a church building which cost $35. Evangelist Shi did much of the carpenter work, and his wife with other women gathered the grass with which the roof was thatched. They organized with 22 charter members.

There on the highway between Pekin and Nankin, day after day, he has preached and scattered literature to the thousands passing. Throughout the entire Chu Cheo district he has made his influence tell for Christ. Before the high and low he has testified. When land was first purchased at Chu Cheo for missionary work and trouble arose, before the high official as a witness he bowed, and when asked he confessed that he, too, had accepted the doctrine of the "foreign devils." "Will you preach to us?" asked the judge in derision. "If I should say what I know of the doctrine, his excellency would say he knew more; it is, however, in his power to hear it," was the answer.

Rarely does one see more tact used than he commands as he seeks a man, and when that man is won it is not to Evangelist Shi, but to his Master. In his preaching there is a total abandonment of the man. He lives in his descriptions, is the enraged judge or the innocent child; he may sing a hymn all alone or repeat it, or ask one of the audience to read a sentence and thus commit himself. One sees no more enraptured face or fascinated audience than when Shi "Sien Seng" loses himself as he describes the love of Christ. The one English sentence he knows is, "I know Jesus died for me." He has been in journeyings often, in storm and sunshine, and knows how to be exalted or abased.

New York Letter.

Bro. R. H. Bolton, pastor of the Church of Christ at Everett, Mass., and editor of the New England Messenger, has resigned from the pastorate of the Everett Church, to take effect at the expiration of his fourth year of service, June 30. The church there has grown until it needs the undivided time of a minister; and Bro. Bolton feels that he can do a larger and more effective work through the Messenger, which he proposes to make a weekly, and also by doing mission work in and around Boston as circumstances may permit. There are a million people within a radius of twenty miles around Boston and only three churches of the Disciples of Christ. The Messenger suggests that a church be planted as soon as possible in the state of New Hampshire, where now we have not a single congregation; and that a number of missions be inaugurated in the vicinity of Boston. We sincerely hope Bro. Bolton and others may successfully prosecute this work in that populous center of New England.

We hope to inaugurate a forward city mission movement here at the metropolis also in the coming autumn. At the annual meeting of the Disciples Club, of New York, held May 23, we decided to take up the work of city missions in the fall, putting the enterprise into some form that will interest and call forth the co-operation and support of all our congregations. A committee was appointed to look into the matter and report at the first regular meeting in September, when the whole evening will be devoted to a consideration of the question of city missions. The club re-elected Dr. John L. N. Hunt president for the third time; S. T. Willis was elected vice-president, H. S. Butler was made secretary for the third annual term and G. W. Kramer was elected treasurer. These, together with six others, one from each of the congregations, constitute the executive committee. It is confidently believed by many of our members that renewed life and enthusiasm will characterize our Club just in proportion as we carry on aggressive evangelistic work in our cities or its suburbs. We believe brighter and more prosperous days are before us in this city.

On Tuesday evening, May 25, the Greenpoint congregation in Brooklyn gave a delightful public reception to their new pastor, Bro. John Keevil, who recently came to them from the Kentucky Bible College. Bro. W. C. Payne, the Rev. Mr. Finch, of the Noble Street Baptist Church, a brother of the pastor (a Baptist minister also), the writer and others made short congratulatory addressees after which refreshments were served. Bro. Keevil is a young and single man and can afford to help the Greenpoint congregation in the days of its financial weakness. He has promised to labor with them the remainder of the present year at least. We trust he may stay much longer and build up that church as we believe it can and should be done. Bro. Keevil went out from this congregation to prepare for the ministery, as did also his brother Joseph, who now labors in Canada. It is to the credit of this little church that she has sent out at least two preachers of the Word.

"The Point System" in the Sunday-school work is a new and successful scheme, invented and applied by T. E. Cramblet, of the East End Church, Pittsburg. It consists of a set of simple rules and regulations awarding to teachers and scholars so many "points" of merit for certain specified excellencies. For instance, the teacher earns two points by being at teachers' meeting or prayer-meeting, one for being in charge of a class or two for being on time at roll call. The class earns five points when three-fourths of the class are present at baginning of lesson study; if all are present three points are gained, and so on through a fixed scale. The whole system is based upon the thought of emulation or the inspiration of fraternal rivalry. "Let us consider one another to provoke unto love and good works." Bro. Cramblet says the system has been tried in almost half a hundred schools with the most gratifying results; in many instances doubling the attendance, the collections and the interest, and rendering the schools more efficient in every way. If your school needs a wholesome revival perhaps your need may be met by writing T. E. Cramblet, 351 Spahr St., Pittsburg.

The Sunday-school line of the 169th St. Church was 400 long and 400 strong in the "May Walk of the Bront Borough schools on Friday afternoon the 26th—the largest line of the central division, in which the schools from a dozen neighboring churches were marching. There were, perhaps, 15,000 Sunday-school children, beautifully dressed, marching to the strains of martial music, carrying flags and banners through our streets. That day is a beautiful vision and a glorious prophecy!

From the Land of the Turks.

EDITORS CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—For many long years I had been hindered by various causes from visiting the churches established in the different parts of the empire, and all my efforts to remove the difficulties having failed, I appealed to the chief of the Diplomatic Bureau in the Department of State at Washington, during my recent visit to the States, and on the day following I received a very kind and courteous answer, which reads:

Sir:—Referring to your interview of this morning with the chief of the Diplomatic Bureau of this department, I have to inform you that the minister of the United States at Constantinople has this day been instructed to do what he can to secure for you unimpeded opportunity to discharge your duties as the authorized agent of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Respectfully yours,

J. B. MOORE, Assistant Secretary.

Dated Aug. 2, 1898.

Armed with such a letter in our possession we joyfully returned to our field of labor, and were informed that such a letter as mentioned above had been received at the U. S. Legation at Constantinople, and we were asked to call again after the arrival of the newly appointed minister from the United States. A month after our return great was our joy to welcome Bro. and Sister Chapman as our future helpers in the work, and when the United States minister also arrived I went with him to see our new minister. It is needless to say that great was my surprise and disappointment when Mr. Straus told me that he could do nothing for me. At once I saw that I was deceived, but I could not help it. It matters very little by whom I was misled. As the poor, struggling, suffering churches of God had been for years asking me to visit them, I could no longer bear the thought of disappointing them, and I determined, trusting in God, to make the attempt to go to them. I left home on the 2nd inst., and on the afternoon of the following day I was the happy guest of dear Bro. and Sister Johnson at Smyrna. The "Isaac Errett Memorial Chapel" has suffered a great loss of dust and signs of decay. The whole house in its new coat of painting, the neat and tastefully furnished rooms with the happy new couple living in it, presented a sight worthy of the great name. I was glad and proud to be with them, though I could not remain but one night. It being one of the appointed days for Bro. Johnson to give a magic lantern entertainment, the chapel was crowded and I saw Bro. Johnson knew well how to draw the attention of the people by first amusing them with some comic pictures of an elephant revenging himself upon a sportsman who had dared to wound his dignity by shooting an arrow at him. The next series of pictures shown were some pretty views of Scotland and the closing ones were choice selections from the life of our Savior. The work in Smyrna is now in good hands for a great success, but it is not possible for Bro. Johnson to bear the burden alone; he must have an able assistant to hold his hands up. It must be remembered that there are others in that field who are laboring there with a large body of laborers. Our missionaries also must hold a position to command repect, otherwise their work will be uphill and without success. Our steamer reaches Alexandretta to-morrow morning. As soon as I land there I expect to go to Antioch, and thence to visit the church in Bythias, where Bro. Moses Filian preaches. They will be greatly disappointed when they see that Bro. Chapman is not with me, for we had determined to go together, and so I had informod the churches, but afterwards he had preferred to remain and be better prepared that he may be able to speak with the people in their own language. Both Bro. and Sister Chapman have made creditable progress in learning Armenian and hope they will soon be able to talk with the people.

I need, more than ever before, the prayers of my brethren and sisters to support me in this undertaking to visit the suffering children of God in Turkey, and trust will have them till my work is done. Yours in hope,

G. N. SHISHMANIAN.

A Christian Outside the Church.

RESPECTED FRIEND:—Your kind letter of inquiry is at hand. I have read it very carefully and hope that this reply may be of help to you. I am glad to learn of your interest in the Lord's work and I pray the blessing of our dear Heavenly Father to be with you that you may be guided by his Spirit into all truth.

Your question if one can be a Christian outside of any church or organization is one I suppose that could be truthfully answered by either yes or no or by both answers. I suppose that one could be a Christian and never read the Bible, or who never attended church services, but in either case a duty would have been neglected, and such neglect would not be safe. It is the same regarding membership in the church, for it is one of the clearest of our duties as well as a great pleasure. Christ should be our example in all things. "He loved the church and gave himself for it" (Eph. 5:25). We should love what he loved and hate what he hated.

I ask you to consider very carefully this thought: If one Christian has the right to remain out of the church, any other or all others have the right to do the same. If all should do as you suggest there could be no church, the gospel would not be preached and God's plan would prove a failure. Does it not seem that whatever would be wrong for me to do in deciding this great question would also be wrong for you?

I think that "joining the church" is a term that is very much misunderstood. In Acts 2: 47 we read that "the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved." No preacher can open the door of the Lord's church or kingdom, for Christ said to Peter, "No man shall open, no man shall close" (Matt. 16:19). Preachers cannot take people into the church. Having one's name written on a church roll does not, in the sight of Heaven, make one a church member. The Lord adds people to the church. Whom does he add to the church? "Such as are saved." If you are a Christian the Lord has already added you to the church, and you are already a member of his church, For that reason we may not expect to find in the Bible a direct command to join the church, for under the preaching of the apostles becoming a Christian and joining the church meant the same thing. Just as one could not become a Mason without uniting with that order, or could not become a citizen of this country without complying with the conditions laid down in our naturalization laws, so one could not become a citizen of the kingdom of heaven without becoming spiritually naturalized. "Church of God" and "kingdom of God" are synonymous terms in the New Testament. Paul writes (Rom. 8:9), "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his." How are we to receive this Spirit? Peter, speaking to the people who had been led to believe that Christ was divine, said (Acts 2:38), "Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit." Faith, repentance and baptism are the steps that lead to receiving the Spirit or becoming Christians, showing that the one ought to include the other. Under the preaching of the apostles every Christian was a member of the church.

If we could live better and do more good out of the church God, who loves us and provides for our welfare, would have made known the fact to us. One coal of fire separated from the others soon loses its heat. A tree standing alone goes down before the fury of the storm more easily than one protected by its fellows in a forest. God has given us the church as a shelter in a time of storm. The church needs you, but you and I need the church far more than it needs us. If each soldier in an army should go alone to fight, all would go to their death; but when they stand shoulder to shoulder in the ranks each one gives help and power to the others and thus the victory is won. Christ's supreme desire and prayer for his disciples was "that they might be one." We can never answer that prayer by isolating ourselves from his church, his body. We plead with him to answer our prayers. Shall we not answer his prayer by coming into the unity of the faith, having "one Lord, one faith and one baptism?"

"Oh church of the living God,
Before thy throne we bow!
Some are crossing the river
Others are crossing now."

Faithfully your friend,
BRUCE BROWN.

Kansas City Letter.

Friday, May 26, 1899, was a "high day" with the Sunday-schools of Kansas City. For several years the question has been annually broached of a spring Sunday-school "festival," or "jubilee," such as has become an institution in some of the Eastern cities. Since our sister city of Saint Louis has made so great a success of it, we only waited till we couid have a building suitable for such a gathering, to follow her example. Our convention hall afforded the long-desired opportunity, and our first jubilee has come and gone, with "success" as the verdict of all concerned. Despite numerous obstacles, including a very foolish and unwarranted smallpox scare, the afternoon exercises were attended by some seven thousand, principally children, and the evening session by perhaps five thousand, mostly adults and larger pupils. A splendid orchestra and chorus led the music, which was spirited and spiritual, and the addresses were for the most part happily brief and interesting. Bro. W. H. McClain, so well known to all Saint Louis Sunday-school workers, ran up to see how Kansas City did things, and gave us a most happy and complimentary address. He declared the jubilee a success, especially for the first one ever held in the city. Next year we propose filling the vast Convention Hall with twenty thousand children and their friends. All our schools will feel the effect of such a gathering.

It was my privilege to attend the recent convention of the Sedalia district, held at Lamonte May 22-24. I found the brethren of the convention alive to their responsibilities, in a good degree, at least, and disposed to support more heartily the mission work in their district. The report of Bro. Edmond Wilkes, district evangelist, was full of facts concerning the churches and mission fields within the district, and made a deep impression upon the delegates. It cannot but result in larger offerings and more general participation on the part of the churches in that work. I was kindly given a good place on the program to preset the work of the state board, and found the brethren most appreciative in their reception of what I had to say. We all realized more fully than before, I think, that our work is one, whether within the bounds of the district or without. In the evening Miss Mattie Burgess, of Saint Joseph, delighted us all with the story of her work in India. Bro. B. T. Wharton, of Marshall, had preached an inspiring sermon on the first evening, and Bro. Melvin Putman, of Sedalia, was to speak at the closing session, but I was deprived of the pleasure of hearing either of these brethren. Mrs. Virginia Hedges, who had so recently resigned as state secretary of the C. W. B. M., on account of ill health, was prevented, by the same cause, from being present at the convention, to the regret of all.

It has been my good fortune to attend several C. E. conventions, during the past two months, and the feeling is growing upon me that the Christian Endeavor movement is successfully passing through the crucial period into which it entered a year or two ago. So much of earnest purpose, so good a degree of mature wisdom, so large a measure of simple faith and unassumed humility seem to characterize the young people of all the churches connected with this movement as to dissipate any doubt that may have been held as to the future of Christian Endeavor. Christ has honored these youth, who have first honored him, and I see no prospect of any departure of our young people from their loyalty to Christ and his church.

And this matter of loyalty brings me to say a word about the late attacks of the Christian Standard upon the Bethany Reading Courses, and particularly upon the handbook of Bro. H. L. Willett, on the Life and Teachings of Jesus. When I read its lengthy and severe arraignment of that little volume, I asked myself if it were possible that I had been unwittingly giving such spiritual poison to my young people, who had for many months been gathering in my parlor every Saturday evening for the study and discussion of these courses. I determined to make a candid test of the matter. So I asked, at the next meeting of the Reading Circle, that my young people tell me candidly if their study of Bro. Willett's handbook had in any wise disturbed their faith in the inspiration of the Scriptures, the divine character of Jesus Christ, or any other part of their religious faith which they had before held sacred. They were amazed at my question, and with one voice asserted that their faith had been strengthened, and their delight in the study of the dear old book increased by the wonderful prourayal of Jesus in the chapters of Bro. Willett's book. I am confirmed in my conviction that no one could have found heresy in that volume except one who had determined upon it in advance. It is a source of deep regret to a host of the friends of the Christian Standard, among whom I have always been happy to include myself, to see the sad change that has come over the spirit of that great paper within the past few years. O, that the mantle of its founder might have fallen on the shoulders of some man of kindred spirit!

Bro. T. P. Haley has recently closed a fine meeting with his Church, the Springfield Ave. congregotion, in which he was helped by Bro. F. L. Bowen, our city missionary. Nearly thirty members were added to the membership, most of whom made the good confession. Our chuches in this city seem to be prospering all along the line. They are all preparing for Children's Day, next Lord's day, when we hope to have a joyful time in the Lord, and to have fellowship in the work of carrying out our Lord's last commission. Our pastors of Kansas City and vicinity will banquet together on next Friday, June 2nd, and already the speakers are doubtles sharpen their wits for the toasts to which they are to respond.

J. T. Barclay and that Meeting.

In the Christian-Evangelist for March 30th B. B. Tyler discourses in a happy strain of J. T. Barclay, our foreign missionary to Jerusalem. I am reminded of a notable meeting in Louisville, Ky., in the year of our Lord 1856, a meeting comprised in part of some notable worthies in the ministry. Among these I recall J. T. Barcay, together with D. P. Henderson, J. T. Johnson. Aylette Raines, Richard Ricketts, Samuel Ayers, Philip S. Fall, men who stood in the forefront of battle in the days of long ago—names with whom I had the honor of associating, and whose memory is dear to me and to many others. John T. Johnson said to me, "Let us go down to the river and see Bro. Barclay and his family; they have just landed on a steamboat." Down we went, and I was permitted to see our distinguished missionary. Bro. Johnson seemed very happy in renewing his acquaintance with Bro. Barclay and family, but not half so happy as Bro. Barclay appeared to be.

While Bro. Johnson sat in his chair erect, while in conversation, Bro. Barclay leaned forward and was deeply absorbed in all he said of Jerusalem and matters pertaining to his mission to the Jews.

At night he preached to a very large audience and the house was so crowded that I found no place, save in the pulpit, and behind our missionary. Of this I was glad, for it afforded me an opportunity to see and to hear.

That face had rivited my attention—it beamed with intelligence, purity, nobility—a face that bespoke the regenerated, consecrated soul within the clay tenement. Very simple, indeed, was his manner—nothing indicating nervousness or diffidence—full of confidence in himself, knowing well that he understood whereof he spoke. His style I thought not so good. His words no doubt were well chosen and appropriate but long, as we say, and some of them not readily understood. His sentences were long and complicated. This was J. T. Barclay before the great assembly. Perhaps he talked two hours to the delight of all who heard him. But you did not see J. T. Barclay, although your eyes were fixed upon him; you were thinking of Jerusalem, the "City of the Great King;" you were carried away, not by the eloquence of the man, but by the theme and the many interesting facts connected therewith. Yes, he was chockfull of facts without the least embelishment, without the least attempt to make a fair talk. Jerusalem above ground and under ground, its environs, the hills and the brooks and the pools, the walls, the gates, the sacred places, and then the Jordon near by. Of these he spoke, and with such a simple, pleasant manner, that we sighed when the last word was spoken.

I had accompanied Aylette Raines on the railroad from the town of Eminence to Louisville. He was not at ease on the journey; said he: "The devil has great power and may get into one of these T rails and turn it up over the wheel through the floor of the car and kill us." In some things Aylette Raines was very peculiar. While speaking in an aisle of the church on some question before the meeting he remarked that somehow he felt a lack of confidence in himself, and had never been able to overcome it. In the pulpit he said he was all right; in the aisle he was all wrong and could not help it.

During that meeting, one morning, a good brother offered a motion something like this: "Owing to the fact, that now and then wandering, characterless preachers impose on good churches—sometimes destroying them—I move that the preachers organize with authority to defend themselve and the churches." "With authority." This struck Philip S Fall as smacking of ecclesiasticism. He would not permit the liberty guaranteed by the gospel of Christ to be interfered with. He had once been in bondage—knew what it was to be in servitude and what it was to enjoy Christian freedom. The brother making the motion was one of the best of men—sound to the core on faith, repentance and baptism—but he was sick and tired of encountering here and there scamps in the ministry and our not being able to cast them out from among us. He felt, he said, that some drastic measure must be adopted, or ruin was ahead of us as a Christian people. Bro. Fall differed from him, thought if such an organization obtained among us as he desired ruin would inevitably follow.

John T. Johnson made a characteristic speech. He thought the Lord's plan of ridding the church of irresponsible, worthless preachers was good and sufficient; human organizations had not accomplished the end proposed; had been at all times and under all circumstances opposition, hence he was opposed to the brorher's proposition, etc., etc.

At the last, just before taking his seat he said: "Brother, I beg you not to begin this work until I am gone, until this body (touching his body) is under the sod."

They pressed the brother so warmly that the perspiration rose on his forehead and he was a little nervous. The motion failed and the organization never came to pass.

One thing impressed me in hearing Johnson, Fall and others at this meeting, namely, their supreme reverence for the Word of God and their fears as to going contrary to the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus.

These men no doubt had their faults as other men, but if just such men as our pioneers in the Current Reformation have lived in our day and generation I confess that I have never had the pleasure of their acquaintance.

They differ somewhat from some of the distinguished leaders in the Reformotion of today. All in the fear of God and love of Jesus. Amen!

Golden Drops From California.

The dreaded drouth has ended. This has been one of the most singular years, in its weather department, known in California, so say the oldest inhabitants. The year will go down in history, for it has made a record of its own. The lack of rain last spring left thousands of farmers holding an empty sack. They raised nothing, grain or hay. Their ground, however, was in fine condition, the stunted grain seeded the ground and fed stock; harrowing in this ground was such an easy method that twenty per cent. more land than usual was put in, therefore you could simply say the acreage of grain is immense.

But little fall and winter rain came, merely enough to bring up the grain. Once in awhile a little sprinkle of rain would swing around and touch some valley. The winds were all from the north, which are always dry, instead of from the Gulf of California with heavy-laden clouds. The season when we thought we must have rain, January, February and far in March, no rain came. The sun rose clear, sank into the Pacific behind a mountain range and not behind a cloud. The skies were not red nor lowering. Hicks' storm periods were studied. The neighbors would call out, "What does Hicks say?" The moonologists gave all the signs they ever heard of and every Missourian gave his weather knowledge freely. The moon is on its point, "you can hang a powder horn on it, the water is all poured out." Another says, "That moon is on its back and it is a dry moon if the darkey did say, 'Lor' massa, dat moon jes dribble out all de month!'" One discouraged brother said to me, "We've had sixteen moons like that." Hershbell's weather tables went into the daily papers for study. The man of the weather forecast and signal station said, "I have nothing to say; the winds are now the regular trade winds." A scientific searcher stepped out and said the "Japan current is changing; it is leaving the Coast of California and swinging closer to Asia. It is only a matter of time when California will become a desert land. We will now have three dry years." Thus every prognostic had a dry-weather sign, yet with some hope that the rain might come. Men talked to me of the distress that was coming to their families.

My church work since '97 has been in the great San Joaquin Valley, the great farming portion of the state, so that I made weekly vibrations between that and the Santa Clara Valley, the great fruit district of the state; thus I kept in touch with each interest. In Santa Clara Valley, among the orchards, men were sinking wells in every direction—deep well pumps, centrifugal, propellers, lifters, and engines were running day and night. I rode through some of the finest orchards in the world to see them lifting water. They said the earth supply was giving out, and it was no mistake. Each different part of the country would ask me, "How is it where you live?" and "How is it in the Joaquin (wah keen)?" The grain was green yet and growing a little, the fruit trees were blooming most beautifully and fruit setting in great hope. The time came for our protracted meeting. Bro. Wilkes said, "You'll have rain now, Bro. Durham's coming." We started in at Acampo on 13th. We announced that we would more than likely have rain during our meeting; we would then have thanksgiving service. It did not look like rain, but we did not meet again for four days, when we met a large audience and had one of the most devoted thanksgiving and praise services I ever attended. And now more than a week has passed and we have held praise service alternating with the rains. And now all the talk in every home is the grand rain and the wonderful prospects for California. I wrote to my brethren and friends: "Cheer up, my friends, cheer up, cease now thy sad repining, these are golden raindrops with free silver lining." A Methodist preacher passed me on the street and called out to me, "This is a regular Methodist rain, for it is all sprinkles." He then rushed off in his buggy before I had time to tell him that California had those sprinkles along till the people had lost all hope, until the regenerating waters came and the whole land had been completely baptized and now a new life is in every heart. In all my years in California, I have never seen such a change, and such a delight. The rain is very abundant. And while, Bro. Editor, I have written more than I intended when I began, yet you have no idea of the conditions as I have contrasted them. The mines were closing down for want of water and business was on the eve of a fearful paralysis. When the rain came, crowds of business men in San Francisco gathered about the telephone office at Central to hear from different parts of the state. "I will praise the Lord at all times."

Wanted to be Simply a Christian.

DEAR EDITOR:—Two week ago Bro. Wylie, of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, asked me to discuss with him, in the spirit of love and with the Bible as our supreme guide, the doctrine as taught by the Disciples of Christ, or Christians.

He being a young Cumberland Presbyterian minister, pastor of the church at Sandusky, well recommended by his brethren, desired that he might understand more explicitly what we as a body were striving to do.

He said he had heard a great many things said about us that he had found out to be false.

I told him to appoint a time, and we, in love for the truth, would search for what the apostles taught and practiced. He did so and we read and studied all day.

He said he had studied over his condition, being sprinkled for baptism, and had taken his Lexicon and found he was wrong.

I told him to take the Bible and do just what it said and be just what it required him to be. If that would not save him we had no promise. He continued to read and study until yesterday, when he came and demanded baptism of me. I baptized him.

He made a talk to those who were at the baptizing, giving his reasons for his change, which are as follows:

1. He said, "I have been studying this matter over for two months, and went to my lexicons to see if they would not give me relief, but the more I read and studied the more I became dissatisfied. I read my Bible and found I had been preaching heretofore man's theology and not the true gospel.

2. I have been bound, fettered and tied by a human creed (the confession of faith) which I have tried hard to harmonize with the New Testament, but found it impossible. I longed for liberty. I found out these people claim no creed but the Bible. Hence, my second reason for taking this step.

3. I have been sprinkled for baptism, but after searching the Bible and my lexicons I find it is unscriptural.

I can find no such precept nor command anywhere in the Bible, but find instead that "they both went down into the water," and "came up out" of it.

4. I wanted to tell penitents just what Peter and Ananias told them to do in order to be saved and I could not do so and remain where I was.

5. I wanted to be just what the Bible required me to be, a Christian simply; smply a Christian. Presbyterianism required me to wear a human name.

6. I wanted to practice what the apostles practiced, nothing more. I could not do so and be a Presbyterian, for they sprinkle or pour water upon infants for baptism and I find no record where they did so in apostolic times.

7. I wanted to be in a church where I could do as the people did in the days of the apostles, meet on the first day of the week and show Christ's death till he comes.

I am going to change; I am getting a support where I stand, but I can't conscientiously preach Presbyterianism.

I am going out into the world to preach the gospel, I don't know where.

Brethren, if others would read and be satisfied with what God says, ere long we would all be one!"

Let us hold up Bro. Wylie's hands, that he may be instrumental in saving other souls. I have recommendations from the Presbyterian Church of his good standing, and cheerfully commend him to the brotherhood at large.

Yours for 100,000 in the Jubilee Year.

Strengthening the Brethren.

The incessant rain of ten day's duration did not permit me to leave Anitah until Monday 10th inst., when I started early in the morning, and after 12 hours' hard ride I reached Birejih and the same evening gathering the remnant of the church that had remained there, six in number, I preached to them. On the following morning also I spoke to such as came into my room, and five of those who were present confessed the Savior and were baptized. These five were relatives of the brethren, who were glad of the opportunity and the little flock was greatly encouraged, specially as they had been through the fiery trial that had tried them to the utmost. I regretted that I could not remain with them more than two nights and a day, for they needed much care and exhortation. Leaving Birejih on Wednesday morning the 12th inst., I reached here safely in the afternoon of the following day and finding here two brothers, members of the church in Birejih, they cheerfully took me to their lodging where I was made at home with them. The city of Urfa suffered most in every respect during the recent disturbance.

It will be remembered that in the Armenian Church alone some three thousand men, women and children were burned alive by throwing a large number of cans full of kerosene over them. No tongue nor pen can approach to describe the fiendish deeds that were committed on the defenceless human beings, which are now related by those who were eyewitnesses. Mothers of four and five children, seeing that no other escape was possible, had pitched their own children into the fire from the galleries and afterwards threw themselves also after them in preference to falling into the hands of their enemies who had entered the church to carry them captive. Seeing and hearing all these one would think the reverent would not, could not, have enough life left in them to move about. But here is the mystery: a single American woman, Miss Shattuch, at the risk of her life gathers hundreds of the people and hides them in her own dwelling. Last night she showed me the places and narrow passages where she had stored them and saved their lives. But this is not all: she gathered the orphans under her care, opened schools for them, and now there are under her supervision in the American and German Missions over 1,700 children, orphans and otherwise, who are receiving instruction, and twice a day they are seen passing through the streets as they march to and from the schools; and their enemies see with their eyes the growing Christian force which in future they will find more difficult to supress than ever before. Besides the enormous care of the schools, Miss S. finds time to give employment to a large number of suffering widows to earn their daily bread, doing needlework on fine cloth and the finest linen, which are sent and sold for their benefit to England and other places. The German Mission also has a large carpet factory where some 300 or 400 women find employment to earn their bread. Strange to say, that out of the large body of the American missionaries in Turkey not a single missionary has seen his way to join this noble women who, single-handed with only two of her lady assistants, is doing so much for the suffering Armenians of Urfa. I regret to say that the religious condition of the people of Urfa is much neglected. The old Armenian Church cares but little in this respect and the present bishop is one who strives to keep the people in their old church doctrines and traditions, and the Congregationalists, whose preacher was murdered during the massacre, have employed a preacher who was sent here by the Baptists a few years ago from America, but as his support was stopped after a short time, he consented to preach for them on condition never to speak about baptism. So when they have infants to baptize, they call some one else to perform the ceremony and the preacher keeps at home.

Day after to-morrow I expect to leave Urfa for Serach and Diarbakir, if the Lord permits.

"In His Steps; or, What Would Jesus Do?"

A thirty-two page pamphlet by H. D. Brown, in criticism of Mr. Sheldon's world-famous book, has been issued by a London publishing house. The following extracts furnish the gist of the criticism. Will Bro. Garrison kindly give to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST readers a review of the pamphlet, with his opinion of the critic? W. P. KEELER.

Chicago, May, 1899.

This book, by an American author, has been issued by various publishers in this country under the title of "In His Steps," "Our Exemplar," etc., and has obtained an amazing degree of popularity.

Many well-known and highly respected ministers have strongly recommended it, both in the press and from the pulpit. It has been largely taken up by Christian Endeavor and other kindred societies, while large numbers of very earnest Christians have read it with delight, and speak of having received real spiritual blessing through reading it, while many are distributing it largeiy in the hope of thereby doing much good.

Such being the case, it may seem strange that any one should lift up a warning cry against this publication; and yet faithfulness to God and his truth calls loudly for such a step.

It speaks much of the world's misery and somewhat of the world's sin, but the remedy it presents is MAN'S REMEDY, AND NOT GOD'S.

The whole book is founded upon and permeated with that very popular but most unscriptural doctrine known as a doctrine which ignores the fact that man, through sin, has lost his birthright, and can only obtain it again through faith in and living with the Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God; which denies the necessity for an atonement by the shedding of blood, and speaks of "atonement," or "at-one-ment," as merely the reconciliation of man to God without "the blood of the cross;" and the crucifixion of our Lord as the only highest act of self-sacrifice, as an example for men to follow, and thus work out a salvation for themselves, Christ being not the Savior, but the Helper of all who, after the natural man, thus strive to walk "in his steps." This is but the pride of the human heart which despises God's salvation, and tries to build a Tower of Babel for itself "whose top may reach unto heaven." It is therefore a most popular religion.

THE UNIVERSAL FATHERHOOD OF GOD AND BROTHERHOOD OF CHRIST:

The whole thought of the book may be found embodied in the following sentence in chapter X. Speaking of a supposed philanthropic settlement in an American city it says:

"IT WAS AN IDEA STARTED BY JESUS CHRIST WHEN HE LEFT HIS FATHER'S HOUSE, AND FORSOOK THE RICHES THAT WERE HIS, IN ORDER TO GET NEARER HUMANITY, AND BY BECOMING A PART OF ITS SIN, HELPING TO DRAW HUMANITY APART FROM ITS SIN."

Such a thought, whatever may have been the author's intention, is little short of blasphemy. How could the holy Son of God become a part of the world's sin? This is totally different from his being made "the propitiation . . . for the sins of the whole world," "Who, though our sin was imputed to him, and he bore the penalty due to it to the uttermost, yet was ever "without sin," pure and undefiled. Neither does he help to draw humanity apart from its sin, but he SAVES HIS PEOPLE FROM THEIR SINS. . . . The "Jesus" of this book is not "the Christ of God," but the mere phantom of men's brains, the "Jesus" of Renan, Strauss, Stuart Mill and others of the world's thinkers.

The most crying sin of the present day within the pale of the professing church is the way in which that "Name which is above every name," is dragged from its high and holy place in the Word of God, and used to give color to every lie of Satan. It is ever the cue of the Adversary to pander to the age, and in these democratic days—the days of the iron and the clay—he seeks to belittle Christ by pretending great admiration for him as a "leader of men," "an heroic soul," "the Founder of a new religion," the "introducer of a new philanthropy," the "ideal Man," the "great Example of self-sacrifice," etc., etc., anything that will serve to stir up human pride and keep guilty sinners from looking to him and obtaining peace and pardon "through the blood of his cross. . . . This book, with all the false pietism with which it abounds, and notwithstanding many things that would be excellent were they not put upon a wrong basis, is unsound to the core.

While many of God's people, as we have remarked, reading their own thoughts into it, have doubtless had good impulses stirred within them, we aver that it is a most dangerous book to put into the hands of young Christians, and still more into the hands of unsaved sinners.

But far above and beyond all this is the dishonor done to our Lord. True, the author calls him Lord, and he speaks much of the Spirit, and of prayer; but his thoughts are not God's thoughts, nor his ways God's ways, as these are revealed to us in the Word of God. . . . Let us seek in the power of the Holy Spirit to follow more and more in the steps of our Lord and Savior; but it is only by sitting at his feet, by studying and meditating upon his holy Word, and abiding in him, that we shall ever know what the Lord has done, what he is doing and what for us and for others in his grace and glory he yet will do.

Doubtless, it is the longing for this on the part of many Christians that has led them to welcome the book under review, and to overlook the deadly error which underlies and permeates its teaching.

It is not, however, simply some theological point that is missing, but the whole foundation and keystone of the gospel that is set aside, and no amount of morality, or even of seeming spirituality, can make up for this. The author's Utopia is but an empty dream; it is a vain attempt to build without a foundation, or rather to resuscitate the dead by clothing them with the habiliments of the living.

[We have little patience with the kind of criticism contained in the foregoing extracts. If it is not hypercriticism it is something worse. When any writer, seeking to get at the marrow of the gospel and to reach the conscience of the people of his generation, discards well-worn theological phrases, and expresses God's truth in every-day plain English, we are sure to hear from some mouther of theological phrases who fears that the bulwarks of Christianity are being attacked. Any one who has read carefully the book criticized in the foregoing cannot have failed to see, if his eyes be not blinded by prejudice, that the author takes for granted what his critic would have him discuss as the main theme, and proceeds to make a practical application of Christianity to the problems of our time. This always alarms the mechanical school of theologians, just as Jesus alarmed the Pharisees of his day.

We do not believe there is a word of truth in the criticism. The relation of Christ's death to the salvation of men is not ignored, even though theological formulas and phrases have been discarded. The whole tone of the book is determined by the sacrificial life and death of Christ. What the author was aiming at was to get into the minds of his readers a deeper and worthier conception of the meaning of discipleship and to make a practical application of the doctrine of the cross to the problems of our time. No wonder it has reached the conscience of so many thousands of readers. He might have written a book that would have met the ideas of this critic without touching the conscience of any Christian. It is to be regretted that any one who claims to be a follower of Christ would attempt to neutralize the influence of a book that is wholly good in the interest of certain theological dogmas, phrases and formulas, which he takes for "the keystone of the gospel." But it will not injure the book. It may be the means of inducing others to read it, and we trust this may be the result.—EDITOR.]

Missouri Sunday-School Convention.

The brethren at Plattsburg will give a hearty welcome and free entertainment to the delegates attending the Missouri State Bible-school Convention. To avoid confusion it is earnestly requested that delegates send immediately their names to Dr. C. W. Chastain, Plattsburg, Mo. Should they fail to send in their name, be not astonished nor blame the committee if upon their arrival here they have trouble in finding a home. Upon arrival the delegates will report at the church.

Reverence in Church Worship.

The call to more reverence in church worship reminds me afresh of a beautiful custom observed in all churches in the Far East, whether Chinese, Japanese or English, and which I have sorely missed here. After the benediction the congregation quietly sit down again for a few moments of silent prayer. A more quiet dispersion is almost sure to follow this reverent seal to the sacred service. The custom is always observed in prayer-meetings, conventions and all divine services as well as at church. It is exceedingly impressive and helpful, and equally important with the silent prayer at the beginning of the service.

Beaumont Texas.

Just thirty days a go to-day Elder Geo. Van Pelt, state evangeligst, assisted by Sister Lucile Park, leader of song service, opened a series of gospel meetings in this city, with a few hopeful members, somewhat discouraged by their hitherto unsuccessful attempts to keep banded together as a church. The cold rain, mud and bad crossings tried the faith and courage of those who would attend these interesting meetings, for awhile. But the mud dried up and the weather warmed up—and so did the meeting. We had a purpose, and we were determined to attain to it, and victory has crowned our efforts with a grand success. Fail? Oh, no; we rather guess not! Why should we? Did Gideon fail with his little band to conquer his Lord's enemies? It is results that tell. We are up and on our feet, square together in a solid phalanx, pressing fordward to the mark with our church reorganized, fifty-four enrolled—not many men of us, but, oh my! the good sisters, about sixteen to one—splendid Aid Society, of which all are members—a well-organzed Sunday-school; song books bought and paid for, a nice organ, a present from Sister ——, a hall secured at which to meet until we building our new church. Mr. C. H. Van Wormen enjoys the distinction and honor of presenting us with a charming corner lot in his thriving addition. This was a cheerful gift, and now we know the Lord loves a cheerful giver. Lumber is cheap. The saw-mills are in our midst, and if we touch them right we will get the material for a house, at a small outlay. We are only 20 miles from Port Arthur on the Gulf of Mexico, where another little band was organized a month or so ago. A good pastor to locate here and take charge of both places would suit us. We can't pay much, but we hope the state board will help us bear part of this burden. We are a part of this board, having subscribed $20 to the fund; will do better as we grow older. Through the sympathy and good will of the people of this thriving little city of ten thousand people, with everything prospering, with just a little encouragement we feel assured of success. For God will be with us and help us.

Applications for the Kentucky Female Orphan School.

It is now time for applications to be made to the above school for admission next session. Let it be remembered that this is an orphan school, intended only for girls who have not the means to go to an ordinary boarding school. Even these, however, are urged to give something for their board and tuition, according to their ability. None but earnest, ambitious girls are desired. The school is intended to help those who want to help themselves.

Our friends can assist us very much by looking after suitable pupils for admission, and by interesting those who are able to help pay the way of these girls. We remind these friends that we are obliged to raise $6,000 every year from churches, societies and good people who are interested in our work.

Write for forms of application to the Orphan School, Midway, Ky. M. COLLIS,

Chairman of the Board.

Indianians, Attention!

The missionary convention which met at Irvington May 9-11 revised the constitution of the society that was known for several years as "The Indiana Christian Misssionary Society."

It changed the name back to the former name—"The Missionary Society of the Churches of Christ of Indiana." This was done because the society, when incorporated, was incorporated as "The Missionary Society of the Churches of Christ of Indiana," which name should not have been changed until the name given in the charter was changed also, by act of the legislature. This we hope will be done, for the name Indiana Christian Missionary Society is far preferable.

Other changes were made in the constitution, and it will be found, as revised, in the May issue of the Indiana Christian. Please read it carefully. It has been thought best to make our State Missionary Convention a convention of members of the society and delegates from the churches. To accomplish this the requirements of the constitution must be strictly observed. According to the constitution any member of the Church of Carist, who is in good standing, who shall contribute the sum of one dollar ($1) to the secretary of the society becomes an annual member. Any one who will contribute ten dollars ($10) becomes a life member, and by contributing twenty-five dollars ($25), which can be be paid in five-dollar ($5) annual payments, one becomes a life director.

Also, any church, contributing any amount whatsoever, is entitled to one delegate. If ten dollars ($10) are contributed by a church it is entitled to two delegates; also one additional delegate for each additional ten dollars ($10) thus contributed.

Thus, you see, if you desire to vote at our next convention (semi-annual), which wil be held at Bethany Park, you must become a member or be appointed a delegate from some contributing church.

The board of directors and officers of the society intend to live up to the constitution in all its requirements, and all money received will be wisely expended under their direction.

Let me urge all who read this, to read the constitution, of which one thousand copies have been printed. Also, do not wait for a letter from the secretary, but send in at once one dollar ($1) and become an annual member. Many should become life members and life directors.

Upon receipt of the money we will mail you a printed certificate, duly signed by the president and secretary, which will be your receipt and entitle you to a vote in the state convention.

I have appointed T. J. Legg as field secretary, and all correspondence pertaining to field work should be addressed to him at Logansport.

All money and all correspondence pertaining to finance should be sent direct to the undersigned as provided by the constitution.

Several life directorships, life memberships and annual memberships have been received, and a full report will be made up to the 15th day of each month, which will appear in the Indiana Christian, with a full report of expenditures by the treasurer, Amos Clifford. Who will be the next to take out a life directorship or membership?

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Going to Plattsburg Bible-school Convention? Well, write Dr. C. N. Chastain or go where the committee will have to put the tardy and say nothing. Hear?

Let the preachers help us right this time by not using their permits, but buy the round-trip ticket at one fare, and on roads like the Alton use the permit to end of that line, then buy through. Brethren, do this for us and the work. It is exactly the same to you, and it means so very much to others.

Now that the Frisco also gives us the one fare, I urge those along that line to come, for it has been in the past that they declined us the rate because our folks in their territory did not attend the convention. Now come this time.

Monroe City becomes the banner school in its giving to our work, for while pledging $25, good for them, too, they paid us $50. One class, Henry Wood's, on the day of their mission rally, gave $75 for missons. Think of that, will you? Then, another one of the Bible-school classes gave nearly $50. Think of that, will you?

Blackburn and E. C. Davis gave me the heartiest kind of welcome, as the Pinkertons, Peaks and Stelles have always done, and more: they gave hearty co-operation in the Lord's work. Their new house is a beauty and so adapted to their work that I wish those contemplating building would see it, and D. M. Pinkerton in his quiet way is a success as superintendent of the school.

Good news comes from the award of merit cards, but those not filling or not allowing the children to do so will regret it when they see the returns at the convention, and from the work in the field. The medals are "beauties" and fine.

California is no exception in the growth of our Missouri schools, for B. F. Hill is a worker among the people. The enrollment is 350, double that of any other school in town. The average offering is two and a half cents, while the average of the state is less than two. They have 55 grown men and 75 grown women in the school, and have had new pupils every Sunday this year. They more than doubled their pledge to our work for this year. B. F. Hill and Edmond Wilkes are neighbors, and are as Jonathan and David in their co-operation for Christ, while both are among my best friends in all Missouri, and I love them both.

East Broadway, Sedalia, where F. L. Cook is doing such good work and where they are carrying a debt of $3,300, sends $10 to our work just as F. L. said they would. Brethren, when the preachers ask their people to do any giving for the Master's work, why, the people just do it. Try it for this good cause and report results.

Brethren, I have sad good news for you in the 24 pennies saved up by little Fernie Foudray for Sunday-school work, and when God took her home, mamma opened the bank and sent us the pennies. That is indeed an holy offering unto the Lord, and I mean to bring you the pennies to Plattsburg for holy use, and the little angel saint, looking out of heaven can watch her pennies at work. She had just passed her fourth year when the Lord transplanted the little life.

But one thing is lacking to round up our year's work happily, and that is the funds to meet our obligations. Brethren, pay the pledges, see that they are met, and make us all happy in Christ.

Remember, the Wabash, Burlington, Rock Island, Port Arthur, Frisco, Ft. Scott and Missouri Pacific, give us one fare to Plattsburg, the Katy, one and one-third to to Junction points, the Alton, no rate. Ask your agent in time, and write for instructions if it is not as above. Come to Plattsburg for profit and good. H. F. DAVIS.

Commercial Building, St. Louis.

The Orphan School.

In company with P. W. Harding, of this place, the writer spent last Lord's day in Fulton, Mo., and preached the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class of the Orphans' School. This class was composed of fourteen bright, intelligent girls.

This session closes the ninth year of the school's operation at Fulton. During the past three years the institution has been self-sustaining, with a curriculum thorough and complete and equal to that of any of our schools for girls.

The expenses of the institution have been kept within the limits of $15,000 annually. The paying patronage of the school has furnished about three-fourths of this income. The remainder has come from the generous hearts of donors.

The enrollment during the past session has been 127; of this number 106 have been boarders. At one time 95 young ladies were in the building. Aid has been rendered to over 40 young ladies. Some of this number have been furnished everything. All of them have been helped in part.

Although the school from the beginning has been handicapped for want of ample endowment, it has clung with firm grip to the primary purpose for which the institution was founded. It exists to help girls of limited means, who aspire to equip themselves for life; to educate the daughters of ministers and the dependent young ladies whom God has blessed with talent and inspired with the holy ambition to do good.

The Piano Department has enrolled nearly 60 pupils, the Vocal Department about 20, and all of the pupils have access to the Chorus class.

The Stringed Instrument Department has not lacked for attention, and the class in Elocution has been thoroughly trained. The number of pupils in the Art class has been small, but they have had the benefit of a conscientious and painstaking teacher.

The exercises at the closing of the year drew large audiences, and the people of Fulton manifested renewed interest in the school. The conviction is general that, all things considered, the session of 1898-'99 was the most prosperous in the history of the school. The management enters upon the summer's canvass with renewed hope and, if possible, with double energy.

Several men of wealth of the state have recognized the genuine merits of the school, and they have pledged the president of the institution their financial support. It is confidently believed and predicted that the day is at hand when all the debts of the school, contracted years ago, will be paid off and the long expected endowment of the institution will be fully realized.

The brotherhood of Missouri has no more worthy enterprise than this Orphans' School. Those who have daughters to educate can do no better than to entrust them to Pres. J. B. Jones and his twelve competent teachers. Pres. Jones is one of our very best school men.

We shall long remember the hospitality of the good people of Fulton. S. D. DUTCHER.

Truth Stranger Than Fiction

A STORY OF A STRUGGLE AFTER THE TRUTH AS IT IS FOUND IN CHRIST.

By D. R. DUNGAN.

Many editions of this book have been sold, and the demand increases. It is the most popular book on FIRST PRINCIPLES ever published by our people.

This volume discusses no new themes, nor does it present novel ideas upon the old theme of Christianity. Its novelty is found in protesting against novelties in religion, and insisting upon the usages of the primitive Church. It adopts a method for the discussion of salvation from sin which is, it is hoped, adapted to the popular education on the religious issues of the day. It was written for the benefit of, and is dedicated to, the people, with the prayer and hope that it will be widely read, and that it will do them good.

The author has carefully avoided technical expressions and obscure phrases, in order that it might meet their wants. He has endeavored to take these questions from the exclusive hands of the theologians, and place them in the hands of the people for their own adjudication. Will they, like the Bereans, examine the Scriptures to see whether these things be so?

Nature's Harmonies.

BY HELEN A. RAINS.

Sweet sounds that give my soul delight
Are rising with each other,
And corollas, sweet-scented quite,
In steaming nectar smother
The vagrant bee that steals a kiss,
Like some capricious lover;
And gathers sweets that way and this,
His whole dominion over.

The woods seem full of mystic lore
And rife with summer's choirs,
That count their ros'ries o'er and o
Like consecrated friars.
Which way I turn there comes to me,
From all of nature's sources,
A sense of fullness yet to be,
Thro' underlying forces.

The blooms that graced the apple trees,
Earth's carpeting beneath us
Were full of God's own promises,
And what he will bequeath us.
And not a dewdrop gems the flow'r
Or fresh, sweet breezes quiver,
But what I see the subtle power
That's going on forever.

It is not gained from college rules
Or far-fetched erudition,
This knowledge learned in Nature's schools
Is ours by intuition.
The mystery of growth enwrought
With all progressive features
Within her leafy realm is taught
Without the aid of teachers.

THE EVOLUTION OF A PASTOR; Or, Elder Brune's Experiences at Eastville.

BY A. A. HONEYWELL.

CHAPTER VII.

The king of day arose majestically over the eastern hills, causing the sovereign of darkness to withdraw in haste. Brightness and splendor took the place of gloom and darkness, while the touch of his majesty's presence turned the mountains of snow into mountains of celestial glory. Appropriate, indeed, was such a display of nature's glories, for on this day, many centuries ago, arose our crucified Lord, turning defeat into victory, despair into joy and bringing life and immorality to light.

The joy of Mary when she found her Lord alive instead of dead, and the complete reviving of his disheartened followers was not more marked nor more real than that of the earnest Christian soul who sees in the Savior's victory his own hope of eternal life made sure, or that of the sin-sick heart who perceives that a way has been opened whereby he can become a child of God and heir of salvation.

Nature may, therefore, be pardoned for this excess of apparent joy, manifested by an unusual brilliancy, as if sharing the hope and participating in the joy of the Redeemer of earth. On this beautiful Lord's day morning, the first after the events recorded in the preceding chapter, Elder Brune arose with the sun in order that he might fully prepare himself for the duties of the day.

He had issued his own emancipation proclamation to the elders and did not know but that this would be his last Sunday in Eastville, yet his heart was as light as that of a bird. The burden of the last four months had rolled away, for he had asserted his own independence and was a free man in Christ Jesus.

How dear to the heart of all but ignoble souls is liberty! For it life's blood is freely given. Our fathers cheerfully braved the risks of battle, the fatigues of army life and the poverty and suffering of Valley Forge that liberty might be the heritage of their children. Not less heroic were the efforts of John Huss, Martin Luther and others who risked all, even life, in asserting their independence from papal edicts.

The struggle through which Elder Brune had passed was akin to the above. To him there was everything at stake, so much so that he was willing to cast aside his salary and trust to the uncertainty of the future to provide for the needs of his family.

Although Elder Brune had felt grieved at the actions of the elders, from the very time of his arrival, he, nevertheless, had kept his grievance to himself, not wishing to be the cause of any division in the church. Mrs. Olds' uncalled-for and premature declaration that Elder Brune was to be forced to do the janitor work had, however, revealed to the church the real state of affairs, nor was the world slow in grasping the situation. As a consequence of this information, Elder Brune acquired the sympathy of a great many of those in the world as well as the major part of the church, the direct result of which was an increased attendance at services on this particular Lord's day.

It may be that curiosity was another potent cause in bringing so many to church, thinking that Elder Brune might in some public manner refer to the subject in dispute. In this they were sure to be disappointed, for he did not belong to the class of preachers who make it a practice of referring to their personal grievances in a public address.

It thus happened that when Elder Brune entered the pulpit at the appointed hour he was greeted by a large audience. In fact, every seat was taken and a few were standing.

There is something inspiring in a large and sympathetic audience which materially assists the preacher in the delivery of his sermon. It was evidently so in this case, for Elder Brune delivered an unusually fine and effective sermon. His soul seemed to be on fire with divine truth, and in the elucidation of his theme he had perfect command of mind and tongue. His well-molded sentences followed each other rapidly, smoothly and harmoniously, like the rolling waves of the sea as they chase each other toward the beach. As he portrayed the divine character and mission of the Christ he so arrayed him in his majesty and glory that he stood before them transfigured, his face shining above the brightness of the sun and his raiment white as snow.

The unselfishness of his work, the beauty of his holy life and the heroism of his voluntary death was manifest to many a mind that had previously been indifferent and unappreciative, and as he closed with an appeal to the unconverted to become followers of the Christ and imitate his virtues, many were drawn nearer to the kingdom of heaven than they had ever been before.

After the sermon Bro. Brown came to the front and requested the attention of the audience for a few moments, which request was readily granted, for there was an impression that Bro. Brown's speech would have to do with Elder Brune, and in this they were not disappointed. We will not attempt to give Bro. Brown's talk, word for word, but will content ourselves with the substance of it.

"Brethren and friends: A little over four months ago Bro. Brune began his labors with this church. During that time there has not been perfect harmony between him and the elders; not, however, because of personal feeling, but because of a difference of opinion as to whether he was an elder or pastor of this church, or whether he was an evangelist under our employ to labor as we directed. Bro. Olds and myself held to the latter view and Bro. Brune to the former. In accordance with our views we took the oversight of the work and daily mapped out the work we desired him to do. He being, in our opinion, an employee, we considered it our duty to use him so that the church would reap the greatest benefit. It is needless to say that Bro. Brune did not relish our dictations, but protested that it was not our perogative to hamper him with instructions. This state of affairs was not satisfactory to either Bro. Brune or ourourselves, and so at the earnest invitation of Bro. Brune we met at the parsonage to search the Scriptures and find out who was right.

"As a result of this study, both Bro. Olds and myself become convinced that there were two classes of elders in every well-organized and scriptural church of Christ. One class was to take an oversight of the flock in a limited sense, not devoting their entire time to the work, while the other class are those who "labor in Word and doctrine" and who devote their entire time to feeding the flock and looking after their spiritual needs, and who are to be supported by the church.

"To this class belongs Bro. Brune and, therefore, when we called him to take the work here we virtually called him to the eldership of this church. We are fully convinced that Bro. Brune by virtue of his being called to "labor" for us "in Word and doctrine" is as much entitled to be considered an elder of this church as are Bro. Olds and myself. Having come to this conclusion we fully realize that we have subjected Bro. Brune to much unnecessary humiliation, which we very much regret, although we acted in all good conscience during the entire time. In order that there may be no further misunderstanding I suggest that we as a church express in a public manner that we consider Bro. Brune an elder of the Church of Christ worshiping at Eastville, and I wish that all who do so consider him would stand to their feet." At this invitation to express themselves the entire congregation, members and non-members, arose to their feet. "You see," said Bro. Brown, continuing, "that we are all of one mind in this matter, and I feel quite sure there will be no further friction. Standing, let us unite with with Bro. Brune in prayer that this oneness of mind may continue and that God's will may be done on earth as it is in heaven."

"Let us pray," replied Elder Brune. "Most kind and gracious Heavenly Father, we thank thee that we have safely passed through the troubled waters of discord and entered into the harbor of Christian love and unity. We thank thee that that thy Word has proven itself powerful enough to produce this result. We pray thee to ever guide and guard us in our daily lives, that we may show forth the Christ-life to the world, that they may realize that we have been with Jesus because we 'love one another.' Deal kindly, we pray, thee with those who have never enlisted in the army of our King and help us so to 'lift up' the Christ that they may be drawn unto him. Be with us who have volunteered in his service and as we surround his table and partake of the bread and drink of the wine may our hearts go out in tender love and thankfulness to him who so loved us as to give himself for us. Take us now unto thy charge and keeping and fit us for eternal companionship with the hosts of heaven; we pray for our Redeemer's sake. Amen!"

The communion service that day was notable for the deep sense of gratitude and good fellowship, and was a prophecy of a new era in the Eastville church.

Kind reader, our story has drawn to a close, for we must resist the temptation to follow our hero through the many years of happiness and prosperity that he spent with that church. It will suffice to add that Elder Brune having been recognized as elder and pastor of the church did not seek to "lord it" over the church, but having suffered the consequence of such a a course he was very careful to extend to all that which was their right. As a consequence there was no friction between the elders, now three in number, but oftentimes Bros. Brown, Olds and Brune were seen together discussing the welfare of the the Master's kingdom.

Under this reign of good fellowship even Mrs. Olds forgot to be snappish and bossy, and one day when in an exceptionally good humor she actually apologized to Mrs. Brune for the unkind words spoken in her presence. Mrs. Good aptly defined the situation when she said: "The church is so harmonious and Christian love so prevalent that hardly a service passes but some one confesses Christ. I think we have already entered into the millennium."

Brunswick, O.

"In His Steps."

An English paper says: "The most remarkable feature of the present 'boom' is, of course, the amazing success of Mr. Sheldon's books. About twenty publishers are publishing six-penny novels, and quite fifteen of them are turning out 'What Would Jesus do?' and the half-dozen companion books. There has been nothing in the present century like this sermon story. It has sold in literal millions, 3,000,000 having been sold in this country alone. The success is the more remarkable because two of Mr. Sheldon's stories had been published in serial form in England in 1895 and 1897, and had attracted no special notice. Yet in less than six months the circulation of 'In His Steps' has far surpassed the total circulation of all Mrs. Henry Wood's novels in forty years! 'East Lynne,' which has had a bigger circulation than any other English copyright novel, has only reached 480,000 copies, and it is said that the total number sold of Wm. Black's novels is not more than 300,000. 'Three Men in a Boat,' a remarkably popular book, reached 160,000; 'Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush,' 90,000; 'A Prisoner of Zenda,' 70,000; and the 'Christian,' the most popular book of 1897, sold to the extent of 123,000 copies in that year. But how paltry these figures are beside Mr. Sheldon's millions! Three of his books, published at a penny, ran through an aggregate edition of 900,000 in three weeks, and there are altogether not less than fifty editions on the market. Twenty English firms are competing in publishing these volumes of sermons preached in Kansas."

How it Pays.

I met with a brewer, a good man in his way, who had been a member and office-bearer in our church for years. He was a man kindly, generous, ready to help any one in distress, and with a kindly word for anybody in trouble. He met me; we had a hearty shake of the hand. He said, "Well, Mr. Garrett, I suppose you are as earnest in teetotalism as ever." "Yes," I said, "rather more." "Well," he said, "it's all right, you know; it pleases you and it doesn't hurt me. The fact is, I was never doing better than I am doing now." Not long afterwards I saw his second son coming out of the yard in delirium tremens, with three men struggling with him; a fine young fellow, and broad-chested. I saw them as they wrestled with him; his veins standing out like ropes on his forehead, and his eyes flashing, I saw him fall; they carried him in. Half an hour afterwards I heard a whisper: "He is dead," and I went in to try to comfort the family; and when I entered the room there was the body, and on that side was the mother drunk, and on the other side the brother drunk. As I stood and looked on that horrible scene I heard that father's words again: "It never paid me better."—Rev. Chas. Garrett.

A Reverie.

BY JAMES HENRY FULLER.

A redbird sang in an elm near me the other day. I heard his resonant, liquid music, clear as crystal. I stepped out where I could see him. I looked up and he was facing me, pouring out his notes on me. After I saw him, he sang only two or thee rounds more and flew away. He bade the elm and me adieu, adding, as it were, in his flight: "I am not performing for an audience to-day."

I fell to thinking a moment. The redbird and his music were gone. I merely saw him a moment and heard him; that was all—nothing more. It is thus with us all. We are born, we sing a few notes—life is over. It was easy and most natural for Red to sing. It was an activity that gladened even his accidental and casual observer. There is that for us that is easy and most natural, and will, in the main, be most agreeable to our observers.

Red hastened away to another treetop, near some other poor man's cottage or rich man's palace. He will sing as sweetly there there as here. He may have gone to the darksome bosom of the leafy forest. If so, he is one among a myriad of songsters whose mission it is to sing. Red is surely delighted with his life—this life. He is doing his work singing over it all the while. He thinks not of the morrow. He is diligently filling up to-day.

Sick Headache Cured Without Drugs.

BY W. FRANK ROSS, A. M., M. D.

I have cured absolutely, hundreds of cases of sick headache and have never failed. I learned this cure from the celebrated T. R. Allinson, L. R. C. P., while studying in London, Eng.

Do not drink tea, coffee nor milk. Water is the best drink, though chocolate and graino are admissible. Do not eat sweets, fats or rich foods. By sweets I mean molasses, jelly, jam, marmalade, sweet pickles, pie, cake, candy, and such food. By fats, I mean fat meat, large amounts of butter, cheese, fried foods, rich puddings and grease gravy. The person who has headache should live largely on fruits (dried, raw or cooked), grains (rolled oats, cracked wheat, corn meal, rice, barley, etc.), and vegetables, with lean meat not more than once a day. All condiments, such as pepper, vinegar, mustard, catsup, and horse radish should be avoided. You say, What can I eat? I reply eat anything that God made, as a rule, but do not eat what the cook invents. Drink a cup of water (hot or cold) as soon as you get up in the morning, and just before you go to bed at night. Take two hot baths to make you sweat each week. It is also much better to eat graham bread or whole wheat bread than white.

I guarantee the above rules to cure every case of sick headache, also the above rules faithfully carried out will not only cure sick headache, but will cure nearly one-half the chronic invalids in the United States. Don't laugh. Try it.

The Gardener's Burial.

This is the grave prepared: set down the bier.
Mother, a faithful son we bring thee here,
In loving ease to lie beneath thy breast,
Which many a year with loving toil he drest;
His was the eldest craft, the simple skill
That Adam plied, ere good was known by ill.
The throstle's song at dawn his spirit tuned;
He set his seeds in hope, he grafted, pruned,
Weeded, and mowed, and, with a true son's care,
Wrought thee a mantle of embroidery rare.

The snowdrops and the winter aconite
Came to his call ere frosts had ceased to bite,
He bade the crocus flame as with a charm;
The nestling violets bloomed, and feared no harm,
Knowing that for their sakes a champion meek
Did bloodless battle with the winter bleak;
But when the wealthier months with largess came,
His blazoned beds put heraldry to shame,
And on the summer air such perfume cast
As Saba or the Spice Isles ne'er surpassed.

The birds loved him, for he would not shoot
Even the winged thieves that stole his fruit;
And he loved them—the little fearless wren,
The redbrest, curious in the ways of men,
The pilgrim swallow, and the dearer guest
That sets beneath our eaves her plastered nest;
The merry white-throat, bursting with his song,
Fluttered within his reach and feared no wrong;
And the mute fly-catcher forgot her dread,
And took her prey beside his stooping head.

Receive him, Mother Earth: his work is done.
Blameless he lived, and did offense to none;
Blameless he died, forbidding us to throw
Flowers in his grave, because he loved them so;
But bloom among the grasses on his mound—
He would not have them stifle underground.
We that have loved must leave him: Mother, keep
A faithful watch about him in his sleep.—Anon.

Origin of "Cranks."

One cannot but have noticed that this American habit of plunging unreservedly into popular movements without taking their measure is playing an alarming part in the development of the individual mind and character: it is making of us a nation of cranks—if the reader will not place undue stress upon the word. In the traditional slow-coach age the crank was a rarity. We had maniacs in painful plenty, as we have now, but we had few monomaniacs. To-day one meets a crank at every turn. Every movement that stirs the populace brings into being a swarm of whims and crotchets and crotchety people. And we have these crotchety people in every grade of life. We have always looked for trifling idiosyncrasies in men of mind, but nowadays we want to know concerning every big-brained man we meet what particular subject he is crazy about. The pimples which rather emphasized the symmetry of a man in the past have grown to be great ugly boils. Run your pencil down the list of the best minds of America of to-day, and mark those who, wise in all things else, have shown themselves fools over some question of the day: the names that remain may be counted on one's fingers. The effect upon the development of character is almost as noticeable when one runs over the list of leaders in great movements who have been known for moral excellence. Here is an eminent leader who, since he got it into his head that his reform movement is all there is of life, has not only ceased to pay his debts, but has actually ceased to regard debt-paying as a matter of any importance. And yonder is a man known wherever the English language is spoken, who, since he became engrossed in a particular line of Christian work, has forgotten the ordinary manners of a Christian and grown as unapproachable as a bear. A man cannot lose his sense of proportion without eventually losing his balance of character.—Edward Leigh Fell, in May Lippincott's.

The Horseless Carriage.

As the "proof of the pudding is in the eating," so riding in an automobile is convincing to the most skeptical that it has many advantages over a horse-drawn vehicle. The ease with which these carriages can be handled was first demonstrated to the writer in a ride of two or three hours through the congested streets of the business part of Boston.

The driver experienced no difficulty in guiding the carriage in and out among the ruck of electric cars, heavy trucks and all sorts of traffic that goes to make up the busy panorama daily passing in the business portion of a city. The instantaneous halt or change of direction possible with an automobile gives a feeling of security, compatible with the belief that no matter how great the emergency the carriage will come out triumphant.

Writing from a popular rather than a scientific view, it is not necessary to discuss the mechanical forces constituting the driving power, nor to give in detail any advantages of one motive power over another; be it steam, electricity, vapor, compressed air or any of the great forces, the manipulating of which needs an education in mechanism and engineering to understand, the first questions are—whether the motor carriage is superior to the one drawn by horses, and why? Time enough to discuss the particular power after our minds are settled upon these points.

A person possessed of an unbiased, unprejudiced mind cannot fail to acknowledge that if half that is said in favor of automobiles be true, the time is near when our old-time, faithful friend and servitor, the horse, will be found in the same category with other animals (that are bred in the carefullest manner for pets and companions), and used only occasionally for riding or driving.

Long years of slavery—and too often abuse—have earned for all equine kind a place in the greenest of pastures, beside the stillest of waters, where, shoeless and unencumbered, they may throw up their heels in exultation that steam and electricity have replaced them; while they, secure from kicks, blows and abuse, can give their whole attention to becoming more intelligent and happy creatures. For in spite of the most advanced stage of mechanical propulsion, while men and women continue to be animal-loving beings, the horse will never become entirely obsolete. —Mary Sargent Hopkins, in Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly for June.

Maxims of Marriage.

In Hall Caine's new novel there are a pair of delightful lovers who get married and who formulate the following rules for their guidance:

1. Since you are married, you may as well make the best of it.
2. So make some maxims and try to live up to them.
3. And don't be discouraged if you fail. You will, but perhaps you won't always fail.
4. Never both be cross at the same time. Wait your turn.
5. Never cease to be lovers. If you cease, some one else may begin.
6. You were gentleman and lady before you were husband and wife. Don't forget it.
7. Keep yourself at your best. It is a compliment to your partner.
8. Keep your ideal high. You may miss it, but it is better to miss a high one than hit a low one.
9. A blind love is a foolish love. Encourage the best.
10. Permanent mutual respect is necessary for permanent mutual love.
11. The tight cord is the easiest to snap.
12. If you take liberties, be prepared to give them.
13. There is only one thing worse than quarrels in public. That is caresses.
14. Money is not essential to happiness. but happy people usually have enough.
15. To save some.
16. The easiest way of saving is to do without things.
17. If you can't, then you had better do without a wife.
18. The man who respects his wife does not turn her into a mendicant. Give her a purse of her own.
19. If you save, save at your own expense.
20. In all matters of money, prepare always for the worst and hope for the best. — Sunny South .

Type.

This is the way the girls distributed the type: After reading a letter they laid it on a small piece of paper and put all of the same kind on this paper, which had the letter written on one end. Presently the floor was covered with these small squares. Fifty-six of them were devoted to small and capital letters; twelve to punctuation marks; many others to type smaller or larger than the general kind; others were devoted to thin spaces, thick spaces, m-quods, double quods, etc.; and there was a great heap of "leads." "Leads" are the thin strips that are set up between each line in a column, to keep the lines far enough apart. But there were only eight figures, because the letter "o" is used for zero, and the letter "l" serves for the figure one.

"Look at this funny capital C," cried Tattie in admiration, as she held up a (.

"That's not a C," said Jennie Weston; "it is part of a parenthesis."

"Then where's the other part?" asked Tattie; "has it got broken?" Jennie laughed. Just then soft footsteps were heard in the hall. "Oh, Delight is coming!" cried Jennie, despairingly. "If she doesn't mix up all our type" (a week later she would have said "pi our type"), "at least she will ask a thousand questions!"

The little orphan peeped in the door with her usual smile on her pretty face. "I see you!" she announced. Then she came in. They cautioned her about the type, and she stepped between the little islands till she gained the window-seat. "What are those teensy humps on the ends of those teensy little black long things?" she demanded. Mildred tried to explain. "Oh, they are letters? I've often seen letters on great big signs. I know the steplatter (A) and the peppermint candystick (J) and the lamppost (T) and the slingshot handle (Y) and the fishingworm (S). Oh, yes, and the sawbuck, too (X)! I don't see how they make newspapers with those things. Will they print newspapers in heaven? Jennie's mamma has been telling me about a place called heaven, bigger'n St. Louis, only its up in the sky and you have to die to go there, so I am not in a hurry to go. Did you ever hear of that place?"

"Oh, yes," said Mildred. "We have known about it since we knew anything. Here, Jennie, here is an an 'm;' put it over on that paper."

"What is an 'm?'" asked Delight.

"Just a letter, dear," said Tattie.

"Is that what Wash just got from his mamma?" asked Delight. "I don't think that was much!"

"Has Wash got a letter from his mother?" cried Jennie.

"Yes, just a little while ago; it was wrapped up in a white paper pocket. But I would rather have got a piece of candy than that."

"It wasn't a letter like this, Delight," said Jennie, "but a paper written all over, telling things about herself, that you put in a post office."

"Oh, yes!" cried Delight. "Now I know. And the trains carry them 'way and 'way off, miles and miles. What do you write in letters, Jennie?"

"Anything you like—that you send your love and you are well and how do you do?"

"I wish my mamma would write to me," said the little orphan. "Haven't they got no post offices in heaven, nor no trains? I wisht they was a railroad stretching right square up in the air, and I could ride 'way and 'way up till I was a teensy speck in the sky and the engine would ring a bell and toot and say, 'Here's the depot!' And I would step off on the sidewalk in heaven, and there would stand papa and mamma, standing with smiles on their good faces and paper sacks, 'cause they'd have something they bringed me."

"And would you leave us, dear?" asked Jennie, stopping in her work to kiss the child.

"May be you never heard about all they is in heaven?" suggested Delight.

"Oh, yes," said Mildred, "we know."

"Golden streets?" demanded Delight.

"Yes."

"May be you've forgot about having all you want to eat there," suggested Delight, "and never wanting for nothing at tall, but what it was bringed right up to you."

"This is all very true," said Mildred.

"Then how can you help wanting to go there?" returned the orphan. "You wanted to go to the church festibull the other night, when they wasn't nothing but ice cream and cake!"

"But a while ago," said Tattie, "you said you wasn't in a hurry to go, because you had to die first."

"Sure 'nuff!" exclaimed the child. "I keep forgetting that part. I wisht my legs was a thousand miles long, so I could just give one step and be right there! Oh, look out the window! There goes a man practicing swimming in the air!"

Jennie's curiosity was aroused by this singular announcement. She hastened to the window, tumbling the "q's" into the $ marks. Instantly she exclaimed. "It is a drunken man!" The next moment she turned white and faced about. Tattie came toward the window to look, for drunkards were not frequent sights in Mizzouryville. "Don't look, Tattie!" cried Jennie in great excitement.

"Why not?" asked Tattie. "You saw him."

"Please don't, Tattie, listen to me, for his sake." But Tattie had caught a glimpse of the reeling form. "It's papa!" she whispered. She stared at Jennie as if she could not understand what had happened. Then she caught up her hat and left the room, her face as white as death. It was the first time she had known of her father being intoxicated, though she knew too well that his scanty earnings went to the "dives." When she was gone Jennie threw herself upon the bed and began to sob violently; it seemed to her that from her window she had witnessed a terrible scene in a hopeless tragedy.

In the meantime Washington Shaw, whom we shall no longer call "the robber," since he had relinquished his right to that title, carried his letter to Mrs. Weston. He asked her to read it. It was from the poorhouse of Hammertown, Mo., and read as follows:

"MY BELOVED SON:—Your letter has filled me with such joy that I sit for hours recalling its words from my memory. For I am almost blind, now, and another must read and write for me. It was like hearing from the grave to hear from you. Oh, come to me, my boy, and let me die in your arms. I am on the county farm, where there is a beautiful house. I have everything that heart could wish. The gentleman who takes care of us, Mr. Jas. T. Wrenchingfield, is a kind, cultivated, educated Christian gentleman. He treats me as if he were my own son. I could live here forever in great happiness, but since hearing from you, I long to see you."

"What do you think of it, mom?"

"It must comfort you to know she is so well taken care of," said Mrs. Weston.

"Mrs. Westin, mightly little hand did she have in writin' that epistle! They ain't nothing there about ataking her pen in hand, ner about the victuals. Now anybody that is aeating at a table not thur own (whether boarding or county farming), is contented with victuals. But seems that ma has everything there, and Mr. Wrenchingfield is the best of all. The fact is, she is afraid to say what she feels. That Wrenchingfield has made her skeered. They ain't no knowing what kind of a dog's life she leads. And I'm agoing to Hammertown this blessed evening, and agoing to bring ma here. They's a little coop of a house with a garden I kin rent fur $5 a month right by the depot, and I'm agoing to start a lunch counter there and make my living and be square."

"What's that?" asked Mr. Weston, who had just entered. "Say you're going to Hammertown this evening? Why, I'm going there myself Monday, on legal business. I'll go with you and help you hunt up your mother."

Monday evening Horace Blount and Tony Stubbs stopped at Miss Harriet's for Mildred Taylor, as they wished to go to Weston's and plan the first number of their paper. They planned it as follows: It would consist of four pages, each with two columns, the pages to be 6x8. The first page: first column, salutatory; second column, a short poem and sketch, perhaps historical. Second page: names of the staff and editorials about the Advance Society, literary notes (nothing political), another sketch, perhaps, and Advance Society items. Third page: first column, a short story, with a four-line poem at the top, "to make the page look pretty;" second column, advertisements, if the merchants, etc., could be persuaded to advertise. Fourth page: the first installment of a serial by Mildred Taylor, who was cautioned to study how her characters were to get out of scrapes before she plunged them into difficulties. Since there would still be "corners to fill up," all were to try to invent jokes, which Tony Stubbs was to pass judgment upon. If they made Tony laugh, they would do. "Why isn't Jim Dancy here?" asked George.

"Jim said he could'nt plan papers," replied Horace, "but he could bone the store men for advertisements. He's out boning now. But I wonder why Tattie Marsh wasn't at school to-day."

THE RESURRECTION.*

The resurrection marked the revival of hope in the hearts of the disciples, and ushered in the beginning of that period of hope which grows in majesty unto the consummation of the kingdom. The despair into which the death of Jesus cast the circle of his followers cannot be realized by us who look back at the whole series of events, and see the passion of our Lord as only one link in the chain. To the disciples it was the end of everything. As they departed from the tomb, where they had hastily laid their Master, they had no thought that there was anything more for them. They loved him still as they had always loved. They believed as firmly as ever that he was the promised Messiah. But they were face to face with the fact that he had failed in his struggle with the overpowering opposition of Jewish hatred and misapprehension. The day that followed was one of deepest despondency for them all. The promises which Jesus made during his presence with them, beginning as far back as the scene of the transfiguration, assuring them that he would return from death and be with them again in person did not seem to occur to them. They had fixed their thought so ardently upon the growing hopes of a political establishment in which they were to figure with him as rulers that his death completely shattered their hopes and plunged them into the deepest despair.

It was, therefore, like a shock of surprise and joy too great for belief when the women brought the tidings, on the first day of the week, that the tomb was empty and they had been assured that Jesus had risen from the dead. The disciples were not prepared to believe the message, but Peter and John hastened to the sepulchre to learn more of the strange event, and finding it open and empty they turned away in deeper perplexity, not yet crediting the strange news which had come.

Meantime, Mary of Magdala had come to the tomb on her errand of love, and finding it vacant looked about in surprise and alarm, wondering what had transpired. But as she looked still again into the empty place she saw the figures in white sitting at the spot where the body of the Master had lain, and they spoke to her in question of her grief, to which she responded, as all the disciples would have done, that now their chief concern was to pay fitting respect to the body of the Lord, whose life had been such a benediction, and whose death had passed over them like a storm. Turning away irresolute and depressed, Mary saw some one standing at no great distance from her, and to him she addressed her inquiry, taking him for one of the keepers of the ground. Her sole desire was to find the Master's body. Hope was past, and it remained but to discharge those offices of love which alone could satisfy a loving and tender heart.

But her astonishment was unbounded and quickly turned to a measureless joy when Jesus, for he it was, turned and spoke to her in the familiar voice of the past, calling her by her name. It was the discovery of the Lord, and the words that leaped from her heart, "O, my Master!" expressed the full burden of her recent sorrow and despair, now lifted and transformed into radiant joy. Such a discovery of Jesus one may be permitted to make, even in the midst of the deepest trouble, and perhaps most frequently at such times. Never had Mary felt so truly the supreme joy of the presence of the Lord as when she discovered him afresh on the dawn of that day. And such recognition of his presence with us is possible often only when we have thought for a time that we had lost him forever in the crushing sorrows of life or in the doubts and gloom that sometimes envelop us. It is out of such a discovery that his real presence emerges, to be with us henceforth a perpetual beneniction.

She would have cast herself at his feet and clung to him with all the affection of her passionate and devoted nature, but Jesus gently restrained her and showed to her that, precious as was his bodily presence to her, it was no longer the essential or necessary element of his guidance. He belonged no longer to the world, although he was still in it for a time. His real presence henceforth was to be spiritual, and while the old familiar converse had been dear to all of the disciples, there had been about it those elements of limitation to time and place which made his larger spiritual association impossible. Henceforth the latter was to be supreme. He was to leave them, so far as his visible personality was concerned, that he might be the more with them continuously and universally, as their inspiration, their direction and their friend. It was not simply a refusal to permit Mary to express her affection by touching his hands or feet; perhaps it was not even intended to restrain those expressions of her love. But it was to teach her that they were no longer the chief sources of satisfaction to her and the disciples, since his ministry was now completed, and they could look forward to the perpetual comfort of his presence as never before.

Mary hastened to tell the disciples what she had seen and heard, and the same day Jesus met a company of them, bringing his assurance of peace into their hearts, disquieted by fear of Jewish violence and by anguish at the thought of their loss. The rumors which had floated about among the disciples through the day were now verified. The Lord was with them indeed. He showed them the marks of his passion, and they rejoiced in the certainty that he was with them once more.

But the real ministry and teaching of the resurrection were not exhausted with the personal reappearance of Jesus from the grave. That was the dawn of hope indeed. He was "the first fruits of them that slept" (1 Cor. 15: 20). In the confidence which this fact has brought, his followers have ever gone out of the world in the assurance that they were not perishing, but entering into life. This is the glorious hope, the indubitable certainty which our Lord's resurrection has begotten in the hearts of his people. And yet deeper even than this assurance based on the resurrection of the Lord is the confidence which comes from an actual participation with Christ in the qualities of eternal life and "the powers of the world to come" (Heb. 6:5). What Jesus sought to create in the hearts of his disciples was not alone the confidence that they should live hereafter with him, but as well the actual experience of living with him here and now, in a life which is already the resurrection life, partaking of his character, filled with his Spirit and already possessing thereby the qualities of eternal life. In Paul's mind this is the truest sense of the doctrine of the resurrection; while he had also an answer for those who were disquieted concerning the external fact of bodily dissolution, his deeper thought evermore moves on the level of the life which is risen with Christ, and which by virtue of that resurrection of nature and character already seeks the the things which are above. In John's writings the quality of eternal life is so much identified with the Christian character that death has no longer any significance, save as an episode in the programme of continuous experience with Christ, whose secret is knowledge of the divine nature and submission to the divine will. To John all life is one; it is a continuity which is unbroken. And thus the resurrection, in its truest sense, is seen to be a question of character, disposition, nature, which once achieved postulates as its inevitable consequence whatever transformation of body may be necessary in emerging from the life that now is to that which is to come.

TOPIC FOR JUNE 18.

INTEMPERATE PLEASURES.

(2 Tim. 3:1-7.)

What a catalogue of wild crime and passion it is that Paul names in his letter to young Timothy as likely to be present in the "last times." Whatever he meant by the "last times," certain it is that these sins may be found to-day in the nineteenth century.

"Lovers of self" may be found in any street car, in any store or office, driving along any country road, trading horses or apples, or living under the same roof with those whom they ought to love more than themselves. If you do not love yourself more than others, show it by being kindly and unselfish at home. There's the place. If you are good there you will be good elsewhere.

"Lovers of money" are not rare, are they? It's a good thing to obtain money or power, because both enable us to do good. They are, indeed, one and the same. Money is power, and power is money. But is it not clear that they are merely the means to an end? They are only tools. One should not love tools. Let him rerserve his love for those whom tools can benefit. As well worship idols as love tools.

"Boasting" is an intemperance. Even the saying of something with a view to having ourselves admired is vanity and intemperance. How much more when the attempt to exalt ourselves is deliberate and pompous.

Silent "haughtiness" may be quite as disagreeable as wordy boastfulness and quite as intemperate. Here is one who doesn't care to explain himself, haughtily disdains public opinion and is badly misunderstood. He has superior contempt for the world. Or, here is one who through station or wealth lords it or queens it over all about. Such a one is as disagreeable as a drunkard and more dangerous. A woman in Indianapolis has several notes from the teachers in the public schools stating that her child must be corrected. At last the woman went to the school and said to the teacher: "Don't you know, madam, that my child's grandfather is the heaviest taxpayer in Indiana? I will do nothing with my child nor shall you." It is needless to say the child was discharged from the school in a jiffy. You needn't think, either, that all the haughtiness is confined to the very rich; you have some of it, too. All of us have, some more than others.

"Railers" are common—very common. They jeer at every undertaking save their own. They do not like people, are suspicious, sarcastic, vengeful. They are hornets with stings, and drunk with gall. Their intemperance is as bad as that from raw whiskey.

"Unthankfulness" Paul places among these intemperances. Shakespeare, telling of the death of Cæsar, says:

> "Ingratitude, more strong than traitors' arms, > Quite vanquished him."

An aged Christian said to me: "When I rise in the morning my heart always swells with gratitude to the good God for the sunshine or the rain that may be pouring on the earth. When I lie down I thank him for ease and quiet. When I drink I thank him for cold water." Here is a soul conscious of God. There is no intemperance in such.

Implacable are some intemperate people. Blessed is the peacemaker—yes, and blessed are those who meet the peacemaker half way. Those who will not be mollified, whose anger is unappeasable, whose hatred is implacable, who will not seek peace and pursue it—these are drunkards, drunk with wrath.

So, take each one of these kinds of intemperance which Paul mentions, Endeavorers, and find examples of them right around you. The world is full of them. Our own hearts, too often, are full of them. And when we see them sticking out of others in plain view, let us take a peek around the corner into our own hearts and then go and put our heads under the pump of our own cold self-condemnation and sober up!

What is Wrong With the Bibles?

By W. J. Lhamon, Director.

Call them Bibles if you will, these Vedas, and Shastras, and Avestas, and Kings, and Koran, ... but what is wrong with them? Call them Bibles, but judge them by their fruits, and say if you can why they mingle such a maximum of bitterness with their minimum of sweetness. These are the great books of the East, and they have been so for centuries. Why are Japan and China and Burma and India and Turkey what they are now if these books are altogether wholesome? Why does China stand with her face to the past, worshiping her ancestors whenever she worships gods that are no worse? Why is her government hopelessly corrupt, and why has she no provision for the popular education, and why are the masses of her people illiterate, and why are they helpless in the presence of disease, and hopeless in the presence of death?

The Vedas are older than the New Testament by several centuries. Why are women so degraded in India? They are the slaves of the zenanas. Only one out of 173 of them can read. Widows are scorned and oppressed. Cows are honored and worshiped. Monkeys are popular as gods. Everything is worshiped according to the whim or the superstition of the worshiper. Sudras are scorned by Brahmins, but snakes are sacred. As in ancient Athens, so in modern India, it is easier to find a god than a man. By penances or pilgrimages devotees think to merit salvation regardless of repentance, character or kinship with a holy God. Temple roofs are the shelters at once of the formal worship and physical defilement of priests and their people. Something must be wrong with the Vedas and the Shastras.

Here is a picture of temple worship in Calcutta sufficiently shocking to empahsize our reflection that something must be wrong with the Bibles of that land. It is from an article in this May number of the Missionary Review of the World. The very pious and well-known F. B. Meyer made last winter a tour of India, and this is one of the scenes he describes: "Visit the temple of Uali in Calcutta. It is a gruesome and terrible spectacle. It is well to have seen it once, but I have no desire to repeat the experience. We saw the image of the goddess with her red tongue protruding, as it is said to have done on that bloody field of battle when she discovered she was treading on the dead body of her spouse. The temple, filthy in the extreme, is beset with beggars, specially women, and the rendezvous of villainous people of all kinds. Scores of worshipers may be seen carrying or leading kids, which are on sale in the neighborhood. Before the British Government stopped it children were sacrificed to this horrid deity, but now kids are substituted. Whilst we were standing there one was brought, its head fixed in a crosspiece of wood, and with one blow severed from its body. Then, as its warm blood covered the pavement, a fakir, with matted hair, came and danced in it, bathing his feet in the gore."

What can be wrong with the Koran? The Turk is essentially a barbarian. His recent atrocities in Armenia will not soon be forgotten. They are blood-curdling and indescribable. It was not warfare, or even decent wholesale murder, but brutal butchery of men, women, children and communities. And that not in violation of the Turkish faith, but under the commendation of it. Slave-stealing and slave-trading in Africa and Arabia are carried on by Mohammedans almost exclusively, and that in the interests of slave-holding Mohammedans in Arabia and Persia. Abysinnian boys and girls in the slave-market of Shiraz are worth about as much as riding-horses and baggage-mules. At Mecca, where all the Mohammedans go to pray, there is a slave-market, and an immense trade. The horrors of this slave-raiding in Africa and slave-trading in Arabia cannot be told in one page or in many, but however horrible it is, however repulsive and cruel and murderous, the Koran does not forbid it. It is a privilege of the Mohammedan religion. Mohammed himself was a slave-holder. There must be something vitally, mightily wrong with the Bible of the Mohammedans.

We spoke recently of Christianity as a peerless religion. Our Bible is a peerless Bible. The New Testament teaching of the Golden Rule, and the brotherhood of men, and the Fatherhood of God are parexcellent. There is no defect in the character of Christ, there is nothing to add to his precepts, there is nothing to subtract from his practices. He is wholly sweet and helpful and wholesome. "The astounding fact is that the Bible is the only book in the world that will bear full and permanent translation into life. We all feel sure that it would be better than well for the world if the precepts of this volume were absorbed and transmuted into the actions of men." Our students are asked to keep these questions in mind while studying the religions of the lands where we have planted missions.

Literature.

BY SUNLIT WATERS: A Tampa Story, by Thomas Mitchell Shackleford and William Wilson De Hart. F. Tennyson Neely, London, New York.

The scenes of this story, as the title indicates, is laid in Florida. It is essentially a love story, or rather love stories, as there is a plurality of heroes and heroines. Evidently the theory of the authors is that a love story is good enough without being used as a string to hang any morals upon. The principle characters of the story are people who have gone to Florida as visitors in winter to escape the rigors of the Northern clime. Their affections become intertangled and the story tells the results. John Ormond, a confirmed bachelor, has a very low ideal of marriage and is proof against all the charms of womanhood. Lucian Mordaunt, the author, has a theory about love which is liable to work mischief, if acted upon. It is acted upon in the case of Mr. Carlyle, the lawyer, who argues his helplessness and irresponsibility in loving another woman more than his wife, and in telling her so. The characters are all supposed to be pretty well up in literature, and there is a liberal sprinkling of quotations from well-known authors throughout the book. Some of the descriptions of Florida scenery are very charming, and perhaps one object of the book is to present the charms of Florida, and particularly of Tampa, as a winter resort; at least this is the effect.

It is, on the whole, a very interesting story, well written, and we are not surprised to learn that it is having a large sale. We congratulate our friend, Bro. Shackleford, one of the authors, on the success of this his first literary venture.

THE SIGN OF THY COMING. By George W. Wilson. The Christian Witness Company. Boston, 1899.

This is a book of 366 pages. The writer is an evangelist in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He is the author of three or four other books. The introduction to this volume was prepared by Bishop Ninde, of the Methodist Church. The aim of the author is to show that Pre-Millennialism is unscriptural and unreasonable. The book contains eleven chapters, in which the following topics, with others, are treated: "Is the World Growing Worse and Worse?" "The Anti-Christ—The Man of Sin;" "The Two Resurrections;" "The Comings of the Lord;" "The Gospel of the Kingdom," etc., etc. The first two chapters contain a history and general statement of the Pre-Millennial doctrine. Mr. Wilson is a vigorous thinker and writer. The reader of his book is not left in doubt as to his position.

While the author is clear and strong in the statement of his opposition to the teachings of the Pre-Millennialists, he fails to make known his own position concerning the second coming of Christ. The book is negative rather than positive; it is destructive rather than constructive. At first this seems to be a blemish; but the author on the title-page of his volume informs the reader that he proposes to show that Pre-Millennialism is unscriptural and unreasonable. This is all that he aims to do. He does not attempt constructive work. This he did not propose to do when he began to write.

There are evidences or haste in the preparation of this book. The following are illustrations: "Neander, the great historian, said in 1651;" "in Jude 14;" "in Romans 21:23-36;" "the prophet Ezra," etc. Mr. Wilson says that "in 1890 there were 242 millions of Roman Catholics, and 500 millions of Protestants." One could easily wish that the number of persons accepting Christianity was as great as this statement would lead us to think. The authority for what follows is "The World Almanac and Encyclopedia for 1899:" "The number of thoss who accept Christianity is 477,080,158. The Catholic Church has 230,866,533 adherents; the Protestant Churches have 143,237,625."

Another statement wide of the mark is that the American Bible Society is printing ten million copies "of the Bible annually." In the "Eighty-second Annual Report of the American Bible Society" the statement is made that "the total issues for the year, at home and in foreign lands, amount to 1,362,273 copies." The latest report says that "the total issues of the Society for the year amounted to 1,380,892 copies."

There is language in the book that will at once surprise and please Disciples of Christ who will read the volume. Take the following as illustrations:

"The conditions of salvation must remain unchanged until the condition of man is changed."

"The cry of to-day is sounding everywhere: 'Restore to us the Christianity of Christ.'"

"The kingdom Jesus taught his disciples to pray should come, has come."

"More Jews have been converted during the nineteenth century than for the past fifteen hundred years. Shall this work cease by perverting their faith from a spiritual kingdom already come to a temporal, visible one near at hand?"

"A kingdom has been 'set up,' of neither Jews nor Gentiles, but saints of the Most High."

"When Pentecost came they ceased praying and preaching a coming kingdom, and went everywhere preaching the kingdom of God."

Referring to the discourse delivered on Pentecost, in Jerusalem, Mr. Wilson says:

"Peter's explanation satisfied the 'devout Jews,' and thousands of them believed the gospel and entered the kingdom of God."

"The converts of Pentecost said nothing about a coming kingdom, or Jesus sitting on a throne in a restored Jerusalem, in visibly, bodily presence. They looked upward and to a glorified Christ."

"When Jesus uttered these words [Luke 19:12] he was still in his humiliation, and his kingdom had not come, but it came with power at Pentecost." "Jesus is reigning now."

Such thoughts, from a Methodist, are refreshing to the old-fashioned Disciple of Christ. The time was when he affirmed this teaching and the Methodist denied it. The world moves!

The book is full of good points. His treatment of the return of the Jews to the Holy Land, a topic of perennial interest with some, while not elaborate, is especially clear and strong. Mr. Wilson's optimism, manifest on every page, is a wholesome tonic.

JUNE MAGAZINES.

There is a feast of good things in the Missionary Review of the World for June. Maps and illustrations are numerous and valuable, and the articles are exceedingly interesting and timely. The number is opened by a description of the "Sudan and the Sudanese," by C. T. Wilson, M. A., an Englishman who has visited the country and made a thorough study of the people. An excellent map and two illustrations from photographs accompany it.

The Treasury of Religious Thought for June, 1899, brings into foremost place the Collegiate Reformed Church of New York, which dates from the foundation of the city by the Dutch, and Dr. Donald Sage Mackay, the eloquent young pastor, who has recently come to the charge of the Collegiate Church on Fifth Avenue and 48th Street. Dr. Mackay's portrait makes the frontispiece of this number, and his sermon on "The Power of Conviction" gives some idea of the quality of one of the prominent preachers of New York.

The signs of the times on the industrial and business horizon are outlined in the June number of the American Monthly Review of Reviews. In the department of "The Progress of the World" the editor discusses the new era of prosperity, the restored wages of labor, the tendency toward the consolidation of capital, railroad amalgamation, the relation of modern monopolies to the heaping up of great fortunes, the value of franchises and proposed tax reforms, and other conditions and problems of the day in the business world.

In the June number of the Pall Mall Magazine is an article of great personal and historic interest, by the Hon. William Waldorf Astor, on the founder of the family in America, John Jacob Astor. The article traces the stirring and tragic incidents which led to the adventurous settlement of Astoria, and many details are given of the foundation of the Astor family in America. The illustrations are from unpublished drawings, portraits, etc., a fine photogravure reproduction of Gilbert Stuart's painting of John Jacob Astor forming the frontispiece to the number.

The first chapters of Miss Johnston's brilliant historical romance, "To Have and to Hold," form a most attractive opening for the June Atlantic. Like her previous novel, "Prisoners of Hope," which has commanded such immediate and universal popularity, the scene of the story is laid in early colonial Virginia. The foundation of the plot rests upon the well-known instance of the sending of a ship load of young women from England to the colony soon after its founding, for the purpose of furnishing wives to the colonists; and the masterly manner in which the situation is handled and the plot developed will enchain the attention and interest of all readers from the start.

Obituaries.

JACOB HUGLEY.

The struggle is over at last. The drama of the little white parsonage on the Salt River Hill is complete and the spectators are departed to their homes. Crape hangs on the door and a light burns dim in the chamber of death. The widow and four fatherless children sit silent before their dead. Sorrow unutterable fills their souls and despair sits a monarch on the hearthstone. Enter softly, stranger, bear thy head and bow thy soul in reverence; angels of heavenly love may yet be lingering where a prophet of God fought his last battle. But that is over now. He feels no pain, no mortal sickness preys on his vitals, no deep agony weighs him down, no sense of loneliness makes him sad. No longer he heeds the neglect of the cold, selfish, madly grasping world, that knew nothing of his love, nor heeded his earnest call for a better and purer life.

Poor, indeed, are the people that have no true prophets of God or that refuse the ministry of them he sends. The man of whom I write died not amidst the din of battle, roar of great cannons, in the fierce charge on some of his brother men. No day shall celebrate his birth before a war-loving nation. No pyramid or granite pile, lifting its head above the clouds, will be erected to perpetuate his memory. Neither bronze no marble image will stand sentinel over his grave. Not of this world, the world will heed not his death, nor cherish the memory of his humble life work.

He lived in comparitive obscurity and died in almost solitude in his little home on the silent hill among the great friendly trees. In solitude, but not alone! Was not his Savior tempted in the wilderness? Did he not suffer in the Garden of Agony alone while his trusted friends were asleep? The hosts of Israel were encamped on the plains of Moab, thinking only of their light amusements and pleasures, heedless of the conflict through which their great lawgiver was passing on the cold heights of starlit Pisgah. With no man to close his eyes at the last, the prophet of Israel was not alone; the kiss of his God was upon his brow and angels bore him in state to his royal sepulchre amid the beetling ramparts of gloomy Bethpeor.

The men whose lives have done the most for this world have not been those that marched with the step of blood-stained warrior, nor wore the livery of royalty, but men who trod the ways of lowly peace and humble service, men like their divine Master, who lived to save men's lives, not to destroy them. Jacob Hugley was a plain, honest man of God. To him the pomp and show of wealth, the lust of ambition, the insolence of power and the vanity of earthly fashions were empty baubles, that held no place in his heart.

Now that his life work is over we are asking ourselves, "What was the secret of all this man's strength, to labor on in the face of difficulties, to endure hardships and privations, often poverty and want, that he might preach to the people the gospel? What made him so strong and true, so gentle and modest, so much like a hundred great, good, loving mothers, all in one?" All that were associated with him were influenced by his life for the better.

Doubt in the presence of his strong faith died in the breast of the skeptic, selfishness was warmed into benevolence, the moral coward acquired the courage of its convictions and for the once, at least, stood firm for truth by the side of this plain man. I, who knew him perhaps better than any one else outside of his family, always felt a strange influence when with him for awhile. Some men excite in me the wish to know more, to be a wiser man. I say, "I must get more books, I must read up, I dont know enough." Others impress me with their wonderful hypnotic powers. I say, "I am cold-hearted, I cannot impress anybody, I am cold-headed and repellant. O, that I could do what that man does." But Jacob Hughley always made me wish to be a good man. I would feel, after being for a time in his company, a desire to be Christlike, gentle, corageous, kind-hearted and loyal to my Savior.

He seemed to live to do good. He loved to hear good news, especially of a good meeting. The last time I ever saw him was in December of last year. He had just closed a remarkably successful meeting, I think, up in Macon County. He just keeps talking of that meeting, and of the additions he had then. O, it was a joy to see his plain, honest face light up with a smile as he spoke of the good he had done. Reader, this was no boasting or bragging of his work. It was nothing like boasting. It was simply gladness at the good results. Had it been somebody else, he would have been just as glad to repeat it or to hear it. When I was pastor of the church in Paris, we were together much of the time. He was ever a welcome visitor at the "study." He would frequently hear my sermons, and never failed to find something to commend or praise. He would come up, lay his hand on my shoulder saying, "Well, sir, you did well to-day. That was good."

He set in motion many causes of the the world's betterment. He ever tried to give men a better and broader view of life, of duty, a profounder conception of God, of religion and its purposes and aims; of all that enters into true manliness and right living in this world. There are many families in Kentucky and Missouri to-day that are centers and sources of all that is best in our civilization and morallty, that owe to him their inspiration and moral tone. For over a quarter of a century this earnest man has been going in and out, to and fro, up and down in North Missouri, laboring incessantly both in the pulpit and from house to house, by the fireside, to enlighten the people and to turn them from Satan unto God. To be commended were the following traits of character that were preeminent in the life of Jacob Hugley:

1. Humility. Among the Missouri preachers there were few better scholars than Bro. Jacob Hughley. Yet, he was as humble and docile as a little child. He never asserted himself, never pushed himself into notoriety or position; was content to fill the places that others sought not after and to let his friends assign him his position in the Lord's work. I have heard pedantic young men in the ministry expose their ignorance by pretending to be Greek scholars before Bro. Hugley, little thinking that this plain, humble man had taken a four years' course in the classics and could read the New Testament fluently in the original. The young men of to-day who want to preach are seeking, as a rule, the largest and richest congregations and will not preach rather than go out into the obscure country places, where a few disciples have been gathered together and are able to pay but a hundred dollars or so for preaching. I commend to all young men the humility of this faithful, God-fearing man, who did what he could anywhere, in any way he could to make the world better. He sought only to be useful in any manner and in any position, to the Lord's cause.

2. Brotherly kindness. I never in my life have known a man of more constant, uniform kindness to all than Jacob Hugley. I never knew him, under any stress of provocation, say or do an unkind thing. I've known him to be grossly and shamelessly supplanted by a fellow preacher, to have a brother, who was his guest, and by all the obligations of manhood restrained from seeking his place, go to work to set him aside and to get his place; yet under all the sense of injustice, of violated hospitality and outraged brotherhood, he would calmly go on in the meeting, rendering the assistance required of him and doing all he could to build up his rival in the esteem of his people, knowing that he would thereby be set aside and his rival employed. He was sensible of the injustice done him, and was not unmindful of the meanness of such conduct, but his genuine Christian kindness restrained him from any word or act of complaint or remonstrance.

3. Consecration to his work. He was one of the most faithful, devoted preachers in the state. To the very last he worked on, and never gave up until his sickness was mortal and his worn-out frame forbade further labors.

4. Progressiveness. He never got out of touch with his brethren. He was thoroughly abreast of all the movements of the brotherhood. His Sunday-school, prayer-meeting, Y. P. S. C. E. and the C. W. B. M. all had his sympathy and support. He was the friend and helper of all the agents, secretaries, evangelists, etc., of the various boards.

5. He spoke evil of no man. One great evil of the age is that of evil, hurtful criticisms of other preachers. Bro. Hugley was careful to say nothing of a fellow preacher that would do him harm or injure his usefulness. This is a very commendable trait in any preacher, and one that should be universally cultivated. Great harm is often done a good man by thoughtless criticism or of slander.

I have spoken out of my heart, and feel that these poor words feebly express the worth of such a noble Christian gentleman as Jacob Hugley. It was my honor to be his friend. I was selected by himself to preach his funeral sermon, but a mistake in the dating of the message made it impossible for me to attend. I lay this poor, unworthy offering on his grave. May that God he tried so faithfully to honor and serve be tender to his faithful, loyal and true wife and ten fatherless children!

Biographical notice below was copied from the Paris Mercury, of his own town and has the approval of his wife:

"Jacob Hugley was born near Newcastle, Ky., May 28, 1840, the youngest of ten children. He became a Christian early in life, uniting with the then young and growing movement headed by Alexander Campbell. Despite the opposion of his father, he determined to become a minister and entered Eminence College to prepare himself. For a number of years after graduating he taught Greek, Latin and branches of mathematics at Eminence. He was ordained a minister of the gospel in 1864 and since that time has baptized 6,000 people and married over 600 couples. He was married to Miss Belle Martin, of Louisiana, Mo., in 1870, of which union six children were born, two of whom are dead. He moved to Paris in 1883 and in that time preached for the following churches: Antioch, Union, Madison, Granville, Mt. Carmel, Pleasant Grove, Middle Grove, Mountjoy and others.

"The funeral sermon proper was preached by Elder Briney, but additional remarks were made by Elders Featherston and Abbott. An eloquent prayer was offered by Rev. E. M. Richmond, of Macon.

"The deceased had provided liberally for his family, leaving life insurance amounting to $4,500 besides the home and interest in his brother's estate in Kentucky."

Frank E. Jones preached the memorial sermon at his home at Lincoln, Kansas, and delivered the memorial oration at Galva on Memorial day.

W. R. Burbridge, Hill City, Kan., evanelist, has take a pastorate composed of Hill City, Roscoe, Pioneer and Bogel congregations for six months. At the end of this time he hopes to see a good preacher located permanently.

Dean H. W. Everest is building a beautiful home in University Place, Des Moines. His constant presence about the structure shows a great degree of strength and endurance.

J. H. Callahan has decided to remain in Boothe, Ark., till next March. He is now having regular appointments at schoolhouses. He says there is a crying need for the truth spoken in love in that country.

The pastor of the Memorial Christian Church, of Rock Island, Ia., entered upon his tenth year with that church May 14. During the past year the membership of the church was increased by 77 accessions and $454 was raised for outside missions and benevolences. During the nine years there have been 584 accessions to the church.

H. H. Shick resigned at Omega, Ill., May 27th, to accept a unanimous call to the church at Mulkeytown, Ill., June 4th. This is one of the oldest churches in the state, being organized in 1835 by Jno. Newton Mulkey.

J. L. Greenwell, of the Bible College, Lexington, Ky., will begin his labors with the church at Princeton, Ind., the second Lord's day in June. The church is reported to be doing good work, and becoming more spiritual.

C. J. F. Musgrove, pastor Church of Christ at Ashland, Ill., delivered the memorial sermon in the First Church of Christ in Ashland, May 28th. The Douglas G. A. R. Post gave him a vote of thanks for the sermon. Elder Musgrove also gave the oration to the G. A. R.s at Easton on Decoration Day.

Allan B. Philputt, pastor Central Christian Church, Indianapolis, Ind., will preach the baccalaureate sermon before the students of Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa, June 11th, and will deliver the commencement address of Butler College, Irvington, Ind., June 22nd.

W. H. Waggoner, Eureka, Ill., has appointments in Illinois for the present month as follows: Cerre Gordo, 5-11; Sidney, 12-18; Newman, 19-25. At Greencastle, Ind., 26th to July 2nd.

B. L. Smith, Cor. Sec., Cincinnati, Ohio, called at this office on last Saturday. He was full of hope concerning the outlook for the Jubilee offering for Home Missions. While in the city he called upon our city evangelist, A. J. Marshall, who is now assisting the Carondelet Christian Church.

David Walk delivered the address before the graduating class of the high school, Cisco, Texas, June 2. His subject was "Technical Education." He is on an evangelizing tour in that state.

Miss Bretta Ethel Dawson, of Butler, Mo., is reported to have been the winner of the fine prize piano offered by Mrs. W. T. Moore, the president of Christian College, to the successful person in a certain recent musical contest. Miss Dawson will remain at Christian College, Columbia, Mo., two years longer to continue her musical studies.

Geo. A. Miller, of Covington, Ky., will deliver the address before the Alumni Association of Eureka College, on Wednesday evening the 14th inst. All alumni and the public generally are invited.

J. S. Hughes delivered his lecture, "John of Patmos," at the Edward Street Church, Danville, Ill., May 30th. It was a memorable address from a man consumed with zeal for a noble subject. Churches are blessed that hear him.

R. E. L. Prunty, pastor of the church at Unionville, Mo., has published a booklet on "Change of Heart." The revenue from the sale of this booklet is to go to the payment of the debt on the church at Unionville. Bro. Prunty's philanthropy, as well as the merit of the book, is to be commended. We hope the book will have an extensive sale.

J. L. Smith, pastor of the church at Carrollton, Ill., preached the memorial address in his church for the G. A. R. Post of that city, May 28th. The church was handsomely decorated and filled with people.

Since the dedication of the new church building at Austin, Tex., J. W. Lowber has been preaching a series of evangelistic sermons with good results. Ten persons came forward on two Sundays. The outlook is now bright for the cause in the capital of Texas.

It was not H. A., but J. E. Denton who located at Onawa, Iowa. He does not begin his pastoral labors until June 11th, but he delivered the address to the graduating class there at a union meeting, May 28th.

J. F. Williams closed his work at Stuttgart, Ark., June 1st, and removed to McArthur, Ohio, for awhile. His work at Stuttgart is well spoken of by the people and "press" of that city.

The First Christian Church, Allegheny, Pa., has received 252 into its membership during the two years of W. J. Lhamon's pastorate; 156 of them by confession. The pastor has had no pulpit help in meetings. The church prospers and is giving more largely to missions than ever before.

The editor of this paper spent last Lord's day in Chicago and was present at and participated in the installation services of F. G. Tyrrell, pastor First Christian Church of that city.

A. B. Houze closed his ministry of three years and four months with the Little Flat Rock Church, Ind., to accept a call to Riverside, California.

H. H. Peters, of Rantoul, Ill., delivered the memorial sermon for the G. A. R. Post at Ludlow, Ill , The theme was "Americanism." The churches raised $23 for Home Missions; three times the amount raised last year.

O. D. Maple has accepted work with the church at Scottville, Ill., for half time, and desires to find another church to which he can devote the other half of his time. He held a meeting for the church at Scottville last March with thirty-two additions, and the church so appreciated his work that it called him for half his time. Churches in need of a preacher in reach of Scottville would do well to write to Brother Maple.

E. F. Boggess changed his field of work from Grand Junction to Salida, Col., June 1. He was the pastor of the Christian Church at Grand Junction for about four years and was held in esteem there by all for his work.

O. A. Carr, president of Carr-Burdett College, Sherman, Tex., has an excellent prayer-meeting talk in the May number of the Preacher's Helper, published by G. Holzapfel, Cleona, Pa. Bro. Carr's "talk" is based on Matt 13:12, and while of an expository character, it is full of suggestions vital to godliness.

What We Plead For

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition,
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

MEN OF YESTERDAY

A Series of Character Sketches of Prominent Men Among the Disciples of Christ.

BY THOMAS W. GRAFTON.

Author of "Life of Alexander Campbell."

This volume contains biographical sketches of Walter Scott, Barton W. Stone, John Smith, Isaac Errett, B. W. Johnson and Otis A. Burgess.

The essential facts in the lives of these men are told in an attractive style. This volume meets the demand for information concerning these worthy men, presented brief enough to be read and appreciated by readers of to-day.

TESTIMONIALS.

"Men of Yesterday" is written in that pleasing style that made the "Life of Alexander Campbell," by the same author, so greatly admired. It would be an especially good book to put into the hands of young people. The narratives are full of interest, and these are men with whom the generation now growing up should have some acquaintance."—Peter Ainslie, Editor Christian Tribune, Baltimore, Md.

"The men mentioned in 'Men of Yesterday' are worthy of these sketches and the sketches are worthy of the men. Their histories will inspire noble lives in others. These sketches are not long enough to be wearisome, and not so brief as to be unsatisfactory. The author is happy in his chosen field, happy in the title of the book and happy in the treatment of his subject."—M. M. Davis, Dallas, Tex.

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY, 1522 Locust St., ST. LOUIS, MO.

A Circuit of the Globe.

By A. McLEAN,

Secretary Foreign Christian Missionary Society.

This book contains 62 chapters, 384 large pages of printed matter, and more than 100 portraits and illustrations. The pictures of all the foreign missionaries of the Christian Church, their homes and places of worship, are among the illustrations.

In August, 1895, Secretary McLean, having been granted a leave of absence for one year, started on a visit to all our Foreign Missions, and this volume records in the author's terse, clear style, the impressions he received, the sights he saw, and the needs of our missionaries on the field. It contains a fund of information on the customs of the countries visited, the lives of the people, and the success of our missions. The book is profusely illustrated with pictures taken on the spot. The book is written in a most fascinating manner, enabling the reader to feel as though he had made the trip with the writer. The author set out from Cincinnati, Ohio, crossing the American continent to San Francisco, then across the Pacific Ocean to Japan, stopping at Honolulu, then to China, India, Australia, Egypt, Palestine, Turkey, European countries to London, across the Atlantic to America, and then home. The book gives the social, political and religious phases of the many nations visited by the author. ☞Cash must accompany the order.

Handsomely bound in cloth, price, postpaid, $2.00.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The probabilities of war between Great Britain and the Boers of the Transvaal have become alarmingly imminent. The long-standing grievances of the Uitlanders, or foreign residents of the Transvaal, are the occasion of the present crisis. A petition presented by them to the British Government has been made the excuse for British interference. A conference has been held between President Kruger and Sir Alfred Milner, the British representative, the outcome of which was a total failure to reach an agreement. The British Government has committed itself by this conference to the defense of the rights of the Uitlanders. Kruger has committed himself to the resistance of Great Britain's interference. Between the two there seems to be no possible outcome except war, unless one or the other of the parties backs down. Joseph Chamberlain who, as British Secretary of State for the Colonies, has the management of one side of the controversy, is not gifted in the art of backing down, and President Kruger has never learned how. To adopt arbitration would be to concede the point in which the Boers are chiefly interested, for that would imply the abrogation of the British claim to suzerainty over the Transvaal. If it should come to war there could, of course, be but one ultimate outcome, but the Boers have certain advantages of position and preparation which will make the struggle far from an easy one, and which give them grounds to believe that they might be successful. They are a hard-fighting, straight-shooting set with a tremendous amount of confidence in their own ability to defeat any number of Englishmen. Perhaps the only alternative to war is a long and tedious series of diplomatic negotiations which, if they accomplish nothing else, may at least have the value of affording a temporary relief from the present crisis.

There are two causes for all of these troubles in the Transvaal. One is the treatment of the Uitlanders who, though constituting three-fourths of the population and paying nine-tenths of the taxes, have no voice whatever in the government. All their attempts to obtain redress of grievances have ended where they began. The sympathy of the civlized nations in general has been with them as against their oppressors, but it has not been possible to give them effective aid. The Jameson raid was only one, and that the most conspicious of several attempts, but Great Britain found it unwise to give her sanction to it. The recent petition of the Uitlanders affords the first satisfactory excuse for British interference. The other cause of the trouble is the old claim of British suzerainty over the Transvaal. To do the Boers justice it must be remembered that they moved twice to get beyond the reach of British influence before founding their present republic; that their complete independence was recognized in 1852, and that twenty-five years later their territory was formally and forcibly annexed to the British possessions. In 1880 there was a rebellion against British authority, and while it was in progress the Liberal party, with Gladstone at its head, came into power. Gladstone considered the war against the Boers an unrighteous one and a settlement was at once effected on the basis of a recognition of the independence of the Boers with the single exception that they could make treaties only with the consent of British Government. This remnant of British domination is a constant irritation to the patriotic Boers. It is also a constant temptation to British imperialists who wish to make the suzerainty of Great Britain over the Transvaal a more real and definite matter. Interference on behalf of the oppressed Uitlanders is in itself a worthy work, though scarcely coming within the limits of Great Britain's treaty right. It must be borne in mind, too, that the Uitlanders are in the Transvaal by invitation, but to make money. They have not been lured by false promises, but have voluntarily taken their chances. The Boers say that, if they don't like it, they can leave.

The French people, to whom credit is due for their revulsion of sentiment in favor of Dreyfus, are now giving daily exhibitions of their fickleness and childishness in the conduct of political affairs. The arrival of Major Marchand is made the occasion of demonstrations of sympathy with the army. The Chamber of Deputies is the scene of wild outbursts of confusion which would put to shame the Chicago stock exchange. Royalist outbreaks alarm the Republican ministry which is commonly believed to have a very feeble grasp on the situation. The President is openly insulted and violently defended in the Chamber, and his appearance at the races at Longchamps is treated as a matter of grave political import. Among any people of less mercurial temperament than the French, such a condition of affairs would portend nothing less serious than a bloody revolution, but in France perhaps it is only the gentle means adopted by the public for approving the Dreyfus decision, and by those who disapprove for submitting a minority report on the subject. At any rate Dreyfus is coming back, Paty Du Clam is awaiting trial for conspiracy and treason, and Col. Picquart the defender of Dreyfus in the days of his unpopularity, has been released from the imprisonment which he has suffered for eighteen months on that account. It really begins to appear that in the turbulent French way, justice will after all be done to all the parties involved. Esterhazy, the accomplice of Paty du Clam, will escape the punishment he deserves, because he was shrewd enough to demand a trial and receive an acquittal in the days when public sentiment was against Dreyfus. The most striking characteristic of the present political situation in France is the waning power of the ministry and the increasing respect of all parties for President Loubet.

The Disarmament Conference at The Hague is proceeding with its work with fair promise of success, but it still has a vast amount of mediævalism to combat. The most conspicuous exhibition of this was given when the German representative, Dr. Zorn, spoke against the principle of international arbitration as set forth in the scheme drafted by Sir Julian Pauncefote. Dr. Zorn argued that it was not consistent with the sovereignty of a monarch ruling by divine right or with the independence of a nation to subject itself to any court of arbitration. To commit the settlement of any particular present difficulty to a third party may be legitimate enough, but to agree to leave future questions which have not yet arisen to the arbitration of a tribunal not yet appointed, seemed to him to be not only a hazardous proceeding, but one which was not consonant with the Hohenzollern theory of government. The enunciation of this sentiment in the conference was received, we are told, with an awkward silence, which was at last broken by Sir Julian, who observed that the objection appeared to him to be based on a theory of statecraft "not altogether modern." He was exactly right except that his statement of the case erred by defect. If the canons of diplomatic courtesy had not required careful moderation in language, Sir Julian might have said, what he doubtless really thinks and what we think, too, that the Kaiser's theory of his own powers and prerogatives is hopelessly antiquated, and necessarily handicaps him in any attempt to deal with modern nations on the basis of modern theories of government. It is doubtless true, as Dr. Zorn said, that submission to a tribunal of arbitration is useless, dangerous and impossible, if the king rules by divine right and can do no wrong.

The failure of the Canadian-American Commission to reach a satisfactory agreement in regard to the boundary line between Canada and Alaska was a matter of disappointment to both nations, though even the wildest jingoes on either side did not profess to believe that there would be an appeal to force in settlement of the question. When the points involved in an international dispute are too difficult or important to permit their final settlement immediately in a treaty, there is one resource to fall back upon, viz., a modus vivendi. So in the present case a temporary agreement has been arrived at between Lord Salisbury and Ambassador Choate. Mutual concessions are made and a boundary line is fixed, which, while neither would accept it as final, both will accept as satisfactory for a period of two years. The value of the arrangement is that in the course of this time both will probably find that this settlement involves no particular hardship for either. It will,therefore,be an important help to the permanent location of the boundary. The crucial question, however, as to whether the line shall be ten leagues back from the outer edge of the islands which fringe the coast, or ten leagues from the coast of the main land still remains to be settled. The present agreement relates only to that part of the line which concerns the settlements that have been made in connection with the Chilkoot Pass and the Dalton Trail. In this part where the growth of the population, owing to the gold excitement, is greatest, there was need for immediate settlement. The rest of the line can wait.

The remarkable reluctance which the Cuban soldiers manifested to receiving the bounty which the United States Government offered them, has entirely vanished. There seems to be little or no hesitancy among them now to surrender their arms and to receive their $75 apiece. On one day two thousand Cuban soldiers, by official record, applied for payment at Matanzas, and at other stations the throng of applicants was in proportion. It appears that all difficulty in connection with disbanding the Cuban army is at an end. General Gomez in retiring from his position at the head of the army has issued a farewell manifesto to the Cuban people. In it he expresses kindly feeling toward the Americans, but also a patriotic hope that the time will soon come when the Cubans alone shall rule in Cuba. He says: "None of us thought this extraordinary event (the defeat of Spain) would be followed by a military occupation of the country by our allies, who treat us as a people incapable of acting for ourselves, and who have reduced us to obedience, to submission and to a tutelage imposed by force of circumstances. This cannot be our ultimate fate after the years of struggle, and we should aid by every pacific method in finishing the work of organizing which the Americans accepted in the protocol, and which is as disagreeable for them as for ourselves. This aid will prove useless without concord among all the islanders. Therefore it is necessary to forget past disagreements, to completely unite all elements and to organize a political party, which is needed in any country."

Exciting events continue in the Government of France. The Dupuy ministry has fallen. The resignation of Premier Dupuy is attributed to the fact that too little protection was afforded President Loubet at Auteuil, and too much protection at the races on last Sunday, creating an impression thereby of weakness in the government. After a stormy scene in the Chamber of Deputies the premier's resolution was defeated by nearly 100 votes. While there is much speculation as to the new ministry, there is little question but that it will be much more favorable to Dreyfus. The one now mentioned in the press dispatches as Dupuy's successor is Waldeck-Rousseau, one of France's most eminent lawyers. Another view is that ex-Premier Leon Bourgeois, the chief French delegate at the peace conference, will be summoned from the Hague to succeed Depuy. Bourgeois is thought to be the most eminent republican statesman of France and is said to be in full sympathy with the President. "In one respect the ministerial crisis is most unfortunates, for whatever faults Dupuy may have perpetrated he has managed the Dreyfus controversy with cleverness and energy. It is owing to him and to the manner in which he fooled the generals, who were about to perpetrate a coup d'etat against the republic, that to-day Dreyfus is restored to his rank of captain and on his way home to France. If Bourgeois becomes premier he may be relied upon to carry through the policy with regard to the army that has been inaugurated by Premier Dupuy." President Loubet, in the meantime, is said to be growing in favor with the people daily. His latest and most popular move has been his directing that all disturbers of yesterday shall be freed, and his previous order that the persecutions of the Auteuil disturbers shall be tempered with mercy. The threatening storm-clouds which have so long hung over France are thus beginning to assume at least a less alarming aspect.

UNITY IN FAITH.

In an editorial in The Outlook of June 3rd, on "Unity in Worship," the editor refers to the ten theological propositions recently suggested by Dr. Henry Van Dyke as a possible basis for an evangelical creed. The Outlook argues very correctly and very conclusively that unity cannot come about through any attempts at definitions of doctrine. It points out what every one familiar with history knows, that creeds have been, not unifying, but divisive. The fact is that the creeds were all formed with the express purpose of excluding certain persons and including others. This tendency of creeds to be divisive, The Outlook argues, is not an accident, but a psychological necessity. To define is to circumscribe. "All within these limits is orthodox; all beyond is heterodox."

According to The Outlook, "unity is to be looked for, not in a common creed, but by use of the same or substantially the same symbols in worship, and by co-operation in Christian work." The editor then refers to the growth of sentiment in favor of a liturgy in the non-liturgical churches. There is a reaction against the old Puritan forms, and a decided tendency toward the enrichment of the worship. It is in this direction that The Outlook sees the hope for Christian unity. By patterning a liturgy somewhat after the Episcopal liturgy, though differing from it sufficiently to make it acceptable to the mass of worshipers, the editor of The Outlook thinks an important step would be taken toward bringing about that unity for which we seek.

We are compelled to differ with our esteemed contemporary in this view of the subject. It does not begin far enough back for the source of unity. We do not believe that there will ever be any Christian union realized on a definition of doctrine. Equally impossible does it seem to us to effect the unity for which Jesus prayed by the adoption of any liturgy or form of worship. There must always be liberty for differences of judgment in the one, and differences of taste and temperament in the other.

There is, however, "one faith." We must seek for the unity of the Spirit in the unity of faith. We must distinguish between faith and theological opinion. There is "one faith," because there is one Lord, who is the object of that faith. The only unity that is worth anything is unity in Christ, and that can be secured alone through faith in Christ. It is easy to see that divisions have been brought about through the formulation of systems of doctrine which have been made objects of faith and bases of fellowship. They have come about through mistaken efforts to secure unity through uniformity of doctrine. The Outlook sees this, but it fails to see, apparently, that a similar result would be sure to follow any effort to enforce uniformity in modes of worship. Differences in education and culture, in tastes and temperaments, will insure as great variety in forms of worship as in theological opinions.

As we look back upon the history of the past, with its endless conflicts and controversies over creeds and doctrines, as we study the conditions of the present, and as we try to look out into the future to inquire what is the outlook for Christian unity, we can see but one hope for the fulfillment of our Lord's prayer. It must come through the unity of faith. Jesus Christ must be exalted above all theological opinions and speculations and creeds. To believe in Him, to follow Him, to be loyal to Him, in our hearts and in our lives —that is the only way to unity. There will always be differences of opinion, differences in forms of church government, differences in modes of public worship, differences in architecture, but is not the time coming, and is it not near at hand, when Christians can be large enough and loyal enough to the spirit of Jesus Christ to be one in Him in spite of these differences in relation to matters external? This is our hope.

We are passing through the childhood period of the church. We have not been strong enough either to discriminate wisely between things which differ, or to be tolerant enough with each other. We have been too carnal. We have been too self-willed and self-opinionated. We have assumed too much the air of infallibility. We have been groping in the dark. But the day is dawning. The Sun of Righteousness is rising to His zenith. His beams are driving back the mists of the night. We are coming to see that there is a breadth of sympathy and charity in the heart of God which we have not emulated. The church has been seeking for unity in uniformity, but God is seeking to bring about unity in comprehension; that is to say, a union in Christ, in whom all things consist, or stand together.

In this way only, so far as we can see, will there ever again be "the unity of the Spirit" of which Paul speaks, namely, one body, one Spirit, one hope; one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in all.

HENRY DRUMMOND.

This remarkable man was born in Scotland, August 17, 1851. He was the son of Henry Drummond and Jane Blackwood. Henry Drummond, Sr., was a justice of the peace, president of the Young Men's Christian Association, in Stirling, where he lived, was chairman, or director, of most of the philanthropic institutions of the town, and was a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church, of which he was a member. As a worker in the Sunday-school his efforts were attended with unusual success. In counsel he was sagacious, in friendship he was constant, in business he was upright. His character was fresh and winsome. The elder Drummond, father of the world-famous Henry Drummond, died Jan. 1, 1888. On that day Henry wrote: "The end has come now. My father has begun the New Year. He passed away this morning at five o'clock. He was a good soldier." Henry Drummond was, in many important respects, very much like his father.

He was greatly devoted to his mother. He did not marry. He died Thursday morning March 11, 1897, at Tunbridge Wells, England. His personal friend and biograper, George Adam Smith, says: "He murmured a message to his mother, became unconscious and passed away about eleven o'clock."

From his mother, and her family, Henry Drummond inherited a part of his enthusiasm for nature and the natural sciences. Her brother, James Blackwood, became proficient in chemistry and geology, and constructed a camera obscura, microscope and telescope. He was one of the earliest makers of r daguerrotypes in Scotland. He became an authority on petrology—the science of the constitution of rocks.

The book that made Henry Drummond famous among men in almost all nations was Natural Law in the Spiritual World. His effort was to prove that there is one law—not two, nor many laws; not merely analogy—but one law in the natural world and in the spiritual. The work came into existence in this way: During the week Prof. Drummond lectured to a class of college students on the natural sciences and on the Lord's day he spoke to an audience, consisting for the most part of working men, on subjects of a moral and religious character. At first he kept the two departments by themselves. Gradually, however, they came together in the thought and speech of the man who was at once teacher and preacher. Religion took on the method of expression of science, and the preacher, before he was aware of what had taken place, discovered himself enunciating spiritual law in the exact terms of biology and physics. The editor of a periodical in London, no longer in existence, requested Prof. Drummond to write for his paper. The young man's mind was full of this new and unexpected experience. The papers out of which came the book, entitled Natural Law in the Spiritual World, therefore, appeared in the Clerical World.

An interesting story is told in this connection—especially interesting in connection with our efforts to understand the law of heredity. The story is told by Henry Drummond's brother-in-law, the Rev. Thomas Crerar: "I was with Henry after his father's death in Glenelm, when he found among his father's papers a notebook of his father, the old William Drummond, in which he had some reflections on religious matters. I think the old man wrote, after noting some facts in the spiritual and natural life: 'Would it not be strange if it turned out that the laws of nature and of the spiritual world were the same?' and Henry remarked to me: 'How strange! That is just my idea as expressed in Natural Law. Can there be an inherited idea as well as an inherited tendency?' "

In his recently published "Life of Henry Drummond" George Adam Smith says that "the main argument" in Natural Law "rests upon a couple of unproved, and, in the opinion of many, impossible assumptions."

. . . . . .

"In the first place, Drummond's a priori argument from the principle of continuity was a huge petitio principii. It does not necessarily nor even probably follow that because laws have a certain continuity throughout the physical universe they must also prevail in the spiritual experience of men." . . . . . .

"Drummond was so fascinated by the use of the term life to describe the phenomena in both departments that he did not pause to inquire whether the two kinds of life had anything more than the name in common. Had he entered upon this inquiry, he must have made it obvious that spiritual life contained elements, and was realized in conditions, so foreign to physical life that the identity of the laws governing the phenomena of both might reasonably be regarded as an impossibility."

While Mr. Drummond was yet a student, Messrs. Moody and Sankey visited England, Scotland and Ireland in an evangelizing campaign which is now historic. This was in 1874-5. Drummond threw himself with great zeal into the work. He developed such remarkable talent and skill in working with young men that Mr. Moody invited him to visit his summer school at Northfield and speak to the students. This he did. He visited America, the United States and Canada a number of times. His book, his last, his greatest, The Ascent of Man, was, in substance, delivered before the "Lowell Institute," in Boston, in the form of lectures. In this book he corrects some of the positions taken in Natural Law. He saw, confessed and abandoned certain errors into which he fell in the preparation of his first volume. In this the greatness of the man is seen. His biographer says after quoting a passage from The Ascent of Man: "There could not be a more complete recantation of the principal philosophic heresy of Natural Law."

Henry Drummond was an Evolutionist and a Higher Critic. At the same time he retained the confidence of Mr. Moody, of the Young Men's Christian Associations, and continued to engage in evangelistic work. He gave himself, especially in gospel work, to the task of winning educated persons to the Christ.

An inexplicable feature in Prof. Drummond was his estimate of D. L. Moody. He continued to think that Mr. Moody was the greatest man he ever met—and Mr. Drummond associated with the greatest men of the age. Mr. Gladstone was one of his personal friends and urged him to stand for a seat in Parliament.

Henry Drummond was a great traveler. He was not a "globe trotter." There was purpose in his journeys. He always went somewhere to do something. His first visit to America was as a student of geology. The time was spent in the Rocky Mountains. To read another paragraph, or page, in The Book of Nature he visited Africa. He went to Australia, New Zealand and Japan in the prosecution of his religious work for young men. In the interest of science, politics and missions he visited the New Hebrides.

The story of this interesting young man's life is told in a style that is almost ideal by Prof. George Adam Smith. "The life of Henry Drummond" is a great book.

Editor's Easy Chair.

There are few people who do not look back with more are less pleasure upon the days of their childhood. Those days may have been marked by poverty, by hardship, by many privations, but childhood cares little for these things. There was a young life looking out upon a world that was new and full of wonders. The great, round, red sun sinking to his rest behind the western hills, the full or crescent moon, the glittering stars shining down from their lofty thrones, the cloud, the tempest, the growing grass and flowers, all living things—these filled the young life with awe or with gladness. And then there was the trust of childhood, which lends it one of its chief charms. There are also the pure loves of childhood and youth which come back to us like the sweet scent of fragrant flowers across the gulf of the departed years. All this makes childhood very beautiful as we look back upon it in the deepening twilight of memory. It looms up like a beautiful island in the ocean of the long ago.

And yet, in spite of the charm that lingers about our childhood years, there are few of us who in retrospect would be willing to go back again and begin our lives at the cradle and live them over again. True, the heart sometimes responds to the sentiment of the poet:

"Backward, O backward, Time in thy flight,
Make me a child again, just for to-night."

But then, there is that modifying clause, "just for to-night." Even the poet, whose tender lines we have quoted would not ask to be a child again to live over the years that have passed from childhood to maturity, much less to old age. But why not? Too well we know the thorns that infest life's pathway and the bitterness that is mingled even in its cups of joy. 'Twas beautiful to have been a child once, and to have had the experiences of childhood, but we do not care to purchase this blessedness again at the price of traveling once more life's rough and thorny way.

But we believe there is another and profounder reason why we do not care to go back to infancy and childhood. If death ended all, if the grave were the sepulchre of all of our hopes and aims and aspirations, we believe, full as our lives may have been of toil, of heartache and disappointment, we would be willing to go back again and live them all over rather than drop into the oblivion of an eternal death. But we do not believe this. Our faith and hope penetrate through the darkness that hovers about the terminus of our earth-lives into a glad and radiant future. We shall live again. Rather we shall never cease to live, but enter upon a larger, truer and fuller life as we pass from the seen into the unseen world. If this be so, why should we want to go back to childhood, and thus reverse the current of life's stream instead of allowing it to flow on freely into the great ocean of life, which is its true goal? The best is still before us.

After all, however, was it not in recognition of the real charm of childhood that Jesus said: "Except ye be converted and become as little children ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven?" The trustfulness, the purity, the docility, the bright and buoyant hopes of childhood, with its upward and onward look may still be ours. We are God's little children. He is our loving, tender, Heavenly Father. He has given us many beautiful things to interest us here in this world and to teach us lessons of immortal beauty. He is seeking by all His providences to lead us in paths of happiness and of peace. He knows how much we are engrossed with the mere toys of time and sense, but He is seeking to woo us to nobler and higher things. Let us rejoice that we are God's children and that "like as a father pitieth his children so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him." Lead us on by thy loving, gentle hand, dear Father, and bring us all home at last safe in our Father's house.

Hour of Prayer.

HOW CHASTENING PROVES GOD'S LOVE.

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, June 21st.)

(Heb. 12:5-13; Psa. 119:65-72.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: The chastening of the Lord is proof of His love and our sonship, and is designed to promote our spiritual good.

One of the hard problems which men have tried to solve from long before the days of Job to the present time is how to account for suffering and affliction in the scheme of a beneficent Providence. There is a seeming contradiction in the fact that a child of God suffers affliction, but it is only seeming. The passage quoted from Hebrews goes deeper into the problem. The writer holds that so far from affliction being evidence that God does not love us, it is proof to the contrary:

"For whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth,
And scourgeth every son whom He receiveth."

It is only God dealing with us as with sons, for what son is there whom the father chasteneth not?

It is certainly a source of comfort to us in our troubles and afflictions to know that they are a proof of God's love and are intended for our good. It is not always easy, however, to understand how this can be. We are prone to look upon all our disappointments, our privations, our material losses, as unqualified evils, as pure calamities. But surely, the inspired writers quoted in this lesson reached a profounder philosophy than that. Nor is it difficult in the light of the gospel to understand this philosophy.

According to Christ's teaching, it matters little about the human body except as it is related to the spirit. Man's spiritual nature is what allies him to God, and is man, properly speaking. The body is only the tabernacle in which the spirit resides for a time. Clearly, therefore, whatever promotes man's spiritual growth and development, his approximation to the divine likeness, is gain. If loss of health, loss of property, loss of friends, persecution or adversity of whatever kind serves to turn our hearts more fully to God, to persuade us to turn away from the sins and follies of the flesh and live for the higher things, then they are blessings in disguise, and are indeed proof of God's love. Many a man has had reason to thank God for the troubles that have come upon him, and for the afflictions which have darkened his path. In the night of his sorrow the Star of Bethlehem has dawned upon his vision, and he has learned the real meaning and significance of life.

It was when the prodigal son, who had spent his substance in riotous living in a "far country," came to utter want that he "came to himself" and resolved to return to his father's house. Whether the prodigal son saw it then or not, he must have done so afterwards, and saw that the very meaning of his destitution was to drive him back to his father. How many of us can say as the psalmist does in the passage cited above?

"Before I was afflicted I went astray;
But now I observe Thy Word.
It is good for me that I have been afflicted,
That I might learn Thy statutes."

The proof, then, that God's chastening manifests His love is seen in the effect of this chastening. If it has brought us into better relations with God, if it has caused us to set our affections more on the things above and less on the things that are below, and if it has taught us the value and blessedness of prayer; in a word, if it has strengthened us in our moral and spiritual nature, what better proof could we wish that it was ordered in love?

It is not necessary that we be prodigal sons in order to be benefited by chastisement. There are none of us so good that we cannot be better. "Every branch that beareth fruit he purgeth, that it may bear more fruit" (Jno. 15:2). Instead, therefore, of murmuring when these adversities and afflictions come upon us, it would be far wiser to heed the admonition quoted in this lesson from the wise man:

"My son, regard not lightly the chastening of the Lord, Nor faint when thou art reproved of Him."

PRAYER.

O God our Father, we thank Thee that we are Thy children, and that Thou dealest with us as with children. We thank Thee that Thy chastening hand is laid upon us when we go astray in order to bring us back to Thee and the path of righteousness. Help us to understand the meaning of Thy providences toward us, and of the afflictions that come upon us, and in all these things may we see the proofs of Thy fatherly love and of Thy gracious purpose to keep us in the way of righteousness, to save us from our waywardness and to bring us at last into the enjoyment of Thy presence forever. Thus wooed by Thy goodness and corrected by Thy love, may we be enabled to escape the evils of this present world and attain unto everlasting life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

The life of the Christian should be like the lily in silence, in beauty, in purity, and in profusion of bloom and fragrance.

Questions and Answers.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—Your answers to my questions handed to you some months ago appeared in your last issue. Thanks for the kind consideration given. I trust you will indulge an humble inquirer in search of the truth a step or two farther at least, in order, if possible, to gain sure footing and stand upon "holy ground." Will therefore ask a few more questions, trusting they will receive the same kind, careful consideration those others did.

1. Touching the Davidic descent: Is an affirmation of Paul or any other of Christ's commentators of equal force and absolute certainty as if that affirmation had fallen from the lips of the Master himself?

2. Paul in his second letter to his son Timothy makes this affirmation: "All Scripture given by inspiration of God is profitable," etc., etc. (New Version.) Is there any infallible way for us to determine what Scriptures are given by inspiration of God and what Scriptures are not given by inspiration?

3. What is inspiration in the biblical sense of that term? Not verbal, plenary, etc., etc., but the thing itself, is what I desire to ascertain, pruned of all verbiage.

4. What is truth? as Pilate asked the Savior.

5. Why was it that the persons most familiar with the prophecies concerning the world's great Pacificator regarded him as an impostor?

I. F. JAMES.

Dunksburg, Mo.

(1) A statement of fact by an apostle of Christ should be unqualifiedly accepted as truth. We could not do more than this with a statement of the Master. The apostles were, at least, faithful witnesses, and were competent to testify concerning matters which it was within their power to know.

(2) The Scriptures of the Old and New Testament have been accepted by the consensus of Christian judgment through centuries of investigation, trial and criticism, as inspired by the Holy Spirit. There is no need, therefore, for the common reader to seek to discriminate between what is inspired and what is not inspired. No doubt there are portions of the Scriptures which contain more inspiration than others because more was needed to produce them, but the Scriptures themselves will attend to this discrimination if we will simply allow them to have their normal effect on our minds and hearts.

(3) No definition of inspiration that we now remember has been found entirely satisfactory. In a general way what we mean by inspiration of the Scriptures is that the men who wrote them were so influenced and guided by the Spirit of God as to make their writings a safe guide as to what is essential truth and what is the will of God.

(4) Jesus gave the best answer to that question when he said: "I am the truth." He was truth incarnate. His life was a revelation of God's character and of man's relation and duty to God. This is pre-eminently the truth which Christ was and to which he testified—the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, his own Messiahship and man's duty and destiny.

(5) Reference is made here, we suppose, to the fact that the Jews as a nation rejected Christ—the very people who are supposed to have been most familiar with the prophecies concerning the Messiah. This grew out of the fact that the nation had apostatized from the true religion and had lost the meaning and spirit largely of their own Scriptures. They were looking for a different kind of Messiah from Jesus of Nazareth, and for a different kind of a kingdom from that which he established. Therefore, they rejected Him and crucified Him.

Of course we are to remember, however, that while this was true of the nation, acting officially through its leaders, there were chosen spirits among the Jews who accepted Christ as the fulfillment of their Scriptures, and as the promised Redeemer of the world. The common people heard Jesus gladly, but the high priests, members of the Sanhedrin, the elders and the scribes rejected him.

Having read many helpful things in the Question and Answer department of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST I ask for admission that I may receive some assistance to enable me to meet a question that must be fairly met in many places.

I refer to those who object to Christians encouraging Sunday-schools, Endeavor Societies, Missionary Societies, Aid Societies, the use of the organ, etc., asserting that it is contrary to the teaching of the New Testament. They cite 2 Tim. 3:16, 17; Rev. 22:18, 19, concluding that if God had intended for us to use any other means than the church for the purpose of bringing the gospel to the world he would have given us authority to do so in his Word.

Many are honest in the matter and are willing to assist in any enterprise that the Lord will sustain them in, but they refuse to assist in the above-mentioned ways because the Lord has not authorized it, as they claim, in his Word. Can you give scriptural reasons why such work as above should be encouraged by Christians and oblige one who desires to treat all classes fairly? READER.

Sheridan, Ind., April 25, 1899.

Those who make the objection to Sunday-schools, Christian Endeavor, Missionary and Aid Societies, the organ, etc., err, "not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God." They have a very wrong conception about the nature of the Christian religion and the purpose of the New Testament Scriptures. They imagine that Christians are treated by Christ as slaves, who are given minute directions as to what they are to do and how they are to do it, and that these directions are to be sought for in the New Testament. Nothing is further from the truth than this. Christ has redeemed us from the bondage of the law and made us free. He treats us as freemen, not as slaves. We have liberty in him to do things that He would have us do according to our best judgment in the light of God's Word and of our own experience. The question in reference to all these organizations and agencies is: Do they assist in carrying on the work of the Lord? Are they helpful in disseminating Christian knowledge, in building up Christian character, in extending the kingdom of God among men? If they are, the man who opposes them is opposing the progress of the kingdom of God either consciously or unconsciously. Christ is to be obeyed, of course, in all the commandments he has given, but to look into the New Testament for a detailed account of everything that Christians are permitted to do, and the methods of doing these things, is to wholly misunderstand the difference between the law and the gospel, the difference between bondage and liberty. This false view, wherever it prevail, locks the wheels of Christian progress and effectually prevents the church from fulfilling its great mission in the world.

There is a tradition of an Indian chief who with his tribe fled before the prairie fires till he had crossed a broad river, when he struck his tent-pole into the ground and cried, "Alabama!" (Here we may rest!) He was no prophet. Hostile tribes overpowered them, and they found only graves where they sought a home. This is a parable of the soul; for it, earth has no Alabama.—Sel.

Current Religious Thought

While the Advance tries to be humorous at the expense of the Minneapolis Presbyterian Assembly's action on the McGiffert case, it clearly defends the orthodoxy of the Assembly as against the teaching of the Professor. After some remarks on the situation the Advance says:

Much as Professor McGiffert likes free thinking he does not like the road. It is all right to run wild in books, to kick up your heels at Calvin, to knock over the apostles and smash up creeds and confessions, but when it comes to traveling it is better to take a road where the switches are not all open. The Professor decided to stay on the old Presbyterian train. Some of the brethren strongly intimated that they would like to ditch him off without waiting to get to the station. But finally the Assembly concluded to leave him in the hands of the New York Presbytery.

The public, therefore, generally interprets the Assembly's action as meaning a change of policy, that hereafter heresy trials will be avoided if possible.

But the action of the Assembly was also significant in another respect. It coolly refused to accept Prof. McGiffert's protestation of loyalty to Presbyterian doctrine. Or, to be more exact, it repudiated his repudiation of the interpretation of heresy which had been put upon his views. Reduced to plain English, the Assembly said to Professor McGiffert: "Your claim to orthodoxy is not true." And it is well that the Assembly said it. For some of these teachers are not only threatening the wreck of orthodox doctrines with their teaching, but the English language is in danger of being wrecked by their denials concerning what they teach. It will be a sorry state of affairs when we can understand neither the new theologian's doctrine nor his English.

The Assembly also made it plain that if it thinks less of the place of heresy trials, it thinks more of the factor of common honesty. The sentiment was emphatic that a minister should not stay where he does not belong. When he has ceased to believe with his church or ecclesiastical body to which he belongs, it should not require a heresy trial to get him out. Honesty should take him out. While the Assembly declines to appeal to its ecclesiastical judicature, in Professor McGiffert's case, it does appeal to his manhood.

And this is about the right position. If there are to be no church trials, there must be a very delicate sense of honor.

In The Coming Age for June, Rev. James Mudge, D. D., in giving his reasons for being a Methodist has the following to say concerning the position of that church on some of the doctrines that are still prominent in the religious world. Just how fully Rev. Mudge is in accord with the concurrent thought of the Methodist ministry on the points named we leave our readers to judge:

What are the main doctrines of Methodism? Methodism is strongly Armenian, as distinguished from the Calvinism which so largely prevails in the churches among which it grew up. That is to say, it lays chief stress on the freedom of the human will rather than on the sovereignty of God. It holds to universal redemption instead of particular; in other words, it firmly maintains that Christ died for all men and not for the elect alone; that God's elect are all who freely elect his service, and that by the full, impartial supply of saving grace each person has entire power to repent of his sins and believe in Christ, so that if he does not do this the fault is exclusively his own. God foreordains to eternal life those whom he foresees will, in the exercise of their unrestricted liberty, accept his offered mercy. There can be no such thing as irresistible grace, nor a secured perseverence of the good, infallibility assured through divine power. The existence of moral evil in the world, both in its beginning and its continuance as well, is explained by the fact of moral freedom. Free agency is essential to a moral system, and absolute independence of will is essential to free agency. God, therefore, of necessity limits himself when he creates free agents. They are beyond his absolute control. He may argue and persuade, but he cannot force. To control the wills of free agents is a contradiction, and to work contradictions does not lie within the scope of even infinite strength.

Methodism, while vigorously preaching the lost condition of men, has been careful to guard against the old idea that we are in any way to blame for what Adam did, that we are guilty of somebody else's sin. What we inherit is not sin, but a tendency or bias toward evil, an abnormal condition of our powers and propensities which makes it easy for us to sin. But actual guilt is contracted only when gracious ability to overcome this bias, freely supplied to all, is refused, and there is a voluntary yielding to the stream of evil tendency instead of to the drawing of the divine Spirit. Our depravity is simply our misfortune, not our fault, until we have personally adopted it, made it specifically our own, and thus, by this act of our will, have become sinners. God can forgive the sinner and yet uphold his broken law only through Christ and his great atoning work. It was for this Jesus suffered on Calvary. The philosophy of the atonement admits of various explanations, and Methodism is not unalterably wedded to any, but the clear Bible facts it insists upon as of great importance.

It has been somewhat special in the emphasis it has placed on "the witness of the Spirit" to the new birth; in other words, on a present assurance of salvation, a power to know that we are now the Lord's, as distinguished from a vague hope or a trembling trust that it will be all right at last. This is of the nature of an inward impression, or profound persuasion, wrought upon the mind of the believer by the Holy Ghost and covincing him that he has become a true child of God. Like all impressions or feelings, however, it needs, to attain complete trustworthiness and give perfect confidence, speedy corroboration from other sources. The only infallible test of a new heart is a new life. Feelings must be confirmed by facts before they can be really relied upon. While the direct witness of the Spirit—God speaking immediately to the heart in sweetest tones, saying, Thou art my beloved child in whom I am well pleased—is very precious and important for the comfort and joy of the young convert, the most conclusive evidence, both for him and especially for other people, that salvation has been really wrought within, is the indirect witness; that is, the manifested change in his impulses, purposes, words and deeds.

From the portion of Rev. N. W. Hillis' sermon on "The Works of Ruskin" which appeared in the Treasury for June we give below his eloquent comparison of the soul of man to a great temple:

For a soul is a temple more majestic than any cathedral—a temple in which principles are foundation stones, and habits are columns and pillars, and faculties are master builders, every thought driving a nail and every deed weakening or making strong some timber; the whole standing at last builded either of passions, worthless as wood, hay and stubble, or builded of thoughts and purposes more precious than gold and flashing gems.

Slowly the soul's temple rises. Slowly reason and conscience make beautiful the halls of imagination, the galleries of memory, the chambers of affection. When success makes the colors so bright as to dazzle, trouble comes in to soften the tints. If adversity lends gloom to some room of memory, hope enters to lighten the dark lines. Of old the artist pupil was discouraged with his task, and slept the sleep of despair. But while he slept his Master came in, and with a touch here and a stroke there changed ugliness to beauty, and turned a child's face into the majesty of an angel's, and, awakening from his sleep, the youth marveled that he could have feared, and took up afresh what proved to be a task of inspiration that brought immortal fame.

And the soul is a pupil that works with the Master Builder. Full oft a divine form enters the earthly scene. Thoughts that are not man's enter his mind; hopes that are not his, like angels, knock at his door to aid him in his work. Even death is no vandal. When the body hath done its work death pulls the body down, as Tintoretto, toiling upon his ceiling, pulled down his scaffold to reveal to men a ceiling glorious with lustrous beauty.

While good men sit at home, not knowing that there is anything to be done, not caring to know; cultivating a feeling that politics are tiresome and dirty, and politicians vulgar bullies and bravadoes; half persuaded that a republic is the contemptible rule of a mob, and secretly longing for a splendid and vigorous despotism,—then remember that it is not a government mastered by ignorance, it is a government betrayed by intelligence; it is not the victory of the slums, it is the surrender of the schools; it is not that bad men are brave, but that good men are infidels and cowards.

Reformation of the Nineteenth Century

NINE DECADES OF HISTORY

THE TURBULENT PERIOD—IV.

The Birth of Heresy Hunting—New Questions.

W. T. MOORE.

The Disciples' movement, up to the period now under consideration, has been mainly free from internal dissensions. There had been too much to do outside for troubles to incubate within. The whole movement had been in sharp conflict with almost the entire religious world. It meant practically the overthrow of denominationalism, and that evident purpose was apparent at once to the leaders of the sectarian hosts. It is not strange, therefore, that the Disciples had to fight for every inch of ground they gained in the earlier days of their history. It could not have been otherwise. The very attitude they occupied toward the religious world compelled the state of things which were precipitated.

It is, however, a curious fact in human experience, that sometime or other every movement in society has to pass under review of its own promoters, and often these are less charitable to one another than they are to those regarded as enemies. Perhaps this tendency is akin to what has often been noticed when those who are closely related by blood or otherwise become estranged. The bitterest enemies are always those who have been the best of friends. Nowhere is the saying that extremes beget extremes more forcibly illustrated than in the fact I have stated.

WHEN PERSECUTION IS BITTEREST.

But, however this may be, it cannot be denied that heresy hunting is usually conducted with a zeal in the exact ratio that it comes nearer and nearer to one's own associations. There is never much danger of one being severely persecuted except by members of his own household. The fires of bigotry will not burn except those who use the torch are in some way closely related to the victim.

The communion discussion ended without producing the slightest division in the Disciples' ranks, but there was no longer that ease within their Zion which had characterized the early days of the movement. The old questions between them and the denominations, which had absorbed the attention of the pioneers, had become somewhat stale, and were, therefore, no longer so absorbing in interest as they had been. Many eyes had been turned inward, and some of these had fallen upon what appeared as a dangerous heresy. Some one gave Isaac Errett a doorplate, and on this appeared the cabilistic sign, "Rev." But this was not all. Mr. Errett was then pastor of a church in Detroit Mich., and had the good sense to issue a brief statement in pamphlet form, enumerating some of the principles held by the church for which he was preaching and some of the things for which he was contending. This was at once stigmatized as a creed, although in the document itself it was distinctly stated that it made no such claim.

But the movement had fairly reached the period when heresy hunting was born, and consequently there were those quite ready to denounce the Detroit pastor as one who could no longer be trusted to "contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints."

ILLUSTRATING A GENERAL TENDENCY.

This case was simply symptomatic. It illustrated a general tendency. It marked the beginning of an attempted supervision of freedom of action by a few self-constituted "keepers of the faith." No doubt these men felt they were doing God's service. For the most part they were men of excellent character, and were withal devoted advocates of the Disciples' plea.

The two most representative publications of that time on the heresy-hunting side, were the A. C. Review, edited by Benj. Franklin, and Lard's Quarterly, edited by Moses E. Lard. These publications were outspoken in their condemnation of the Detroit heresy and, catching the flavor of the thing, they seemed to ever afterward delight in pursuing that which savored of unsoundness. There is no question about the sincerity of the writers in these publications. They were men who loved the cause ardently, and who would perhaps have sacrificed even life itself for their convictions. It was this very fact that made them so watchful and that gave such a zeal to their heresy-hunting proclivities. Like Saul of Tarsus, in his opposition to the Christians, they were "exceedingly mad" against every one who refused to walk in the beaten paths of what was understood to be the traditional views of the Disciples, and they even persecuted those of this sort unto strange cities. It is not remarkable, therefore, that Detroit was invaded. Lest any one should imagine that I am overstating the bitterness of the opposition, it may be well to quote the following paragraph from Lard's Quarterly:

"There is not a sound man in our ranks, who has seen the 'Synopsis,' that has not felt scandalized by it. I wish we possessed even one decent apology for its appearance. It is a deep offense against the brotherhood—an offense tossed into the teeth of the people who, for forty years, have been working against the devisive and evil tendency of creeds. That it was meant as an offense by the brethren who have issued it, I cannot think. Still their work has a merit of its own, a merit which no lack of bad intention on their part can affect. Our brethren will accept this 'Synopsis' for what it is, not for what it may possibly not have been designed to be. We are told that this 'Declaration' is not to be taken as a creed. But will this caveat prevent it being so taken? Never. When Aaron's calf came out, had he called it a bird, still all Israel seeing it stand on four legs, with horns and parted hoofs, would have shouted, A calf, a calf, a calf. The brethren "meeting at the corner of Jefferson Avenue and Beaubien Street, Detroit," may call their work in classic phrase a 'Synopsis,' or gently, a 'Declaration;' but we still cry, A creed, a creed. It is not the mere title of the work that constitutes it a creed, but its matter and form, together with the manner in which it is issued and the sanctions by which it is accompanied. This Synopsis is a creed without the appropriate label—a genuine snake in the grass, wearing a honeyed name.

"On its appearance in the American Christian Review, Bro. Franklin expressed his strong disapprobation of this 'Synopsis;' while 'John,' an anonymous writer, in his burlesque of it, has left us in no doubt as to the estimate in which he holds it. With these sound men I fully agree, except in so far as they seem inclined to treat the 'Synopsis' as a small matter. With the writer of this it has a painful significance—painful, because symptomatic of the following items:

"(1) That some of our brethren have lost their former well-grounded opposition to creeds, and now are ready to traffic in these unholy things. This indicates a diseased state of the body. How far this disease extends will be seen by the extent to which the 'Synopsis' is endorsed.

"(2) That these brethren are no longer willing to be styled heretics for the truth's sake, but now wish to avoid that odium by adopting the customs and views of the sects of the day and thus to become themselves a sect.

"(3) That what the world needs in order to learn the faith of these brethren is not the Bible alone, but the Bible and a 'Synopsis of their faith and practice.' With them, then, the Bible is an insufficient enlightener of the human family.

"At these symptoms of degeneracy our brotherhood will feel something more than mere regret. They will feel profoundly ashamed."

THE ORGAN QUESTION.

But this was not all. The organ question had begun to come to the front. Both the Review and Quarterly were bitter in their opposition to the use of the organ in any of our churches, and the spirit of this opposition may be fairly measured when it is stated that only a few years after this period, of which I am writing, the editor of the Quarterly gave all supposed heretics the broad hint that he "had his eye on them," and that they would all be brought to a closer reckoning at the proper time.

It is well to look back to these days in order to understand what must have been the inherent strength of the plea which the Disciples advocated, in order that it might stand the shocks which were frequently given to it. From our present point of view it is easy to see the Disciples have done some clever steering between Scylla and Charybdis.

THE ONE-MAN SYSTEM.

There was one sin which specially came under the condemnation of the heresy hunters. It was the priestly assumption that any one could be the pastor of a church. The tendency among our preachers to call themselves pastors was declared to be the rising of "the one-man power." The New Testament model was a bishopric containing a plurality of elders in every church, and consequently there must be a plurality now in every church, whether there are men in the church who possess the scriptural qualifications or not.

This logic constantly defeated itself. It insisted upon following the scriptural model, but the only thing in which this model was followd, in most cases, was in reference to the plurality of the elders; for in almost every other particular the men chosen to serve were practically without scriptural qualification. It seems almost incredible that, notwithstanding the fact stated, some of the ablest men in the Disciples' ranks, not only defended the plurality notion, but they roundly denounced all who did not accept their interpretations as infallibly correct.

The result of this teaching was that young men of little or no experience were often called "elders" simply because they occupied the pulpit of a church at the stated meetings. The term "Reverend," when applied to one of these preachers, had the very mark of the beast upon it, but this same stripling could be called an "elder" without shocking the sensibilities of heresy hunters in any degree whatever.

Of course, we now smile at these ridiculous things. They appear to be "molehills" to us, but we must remember that they were "mountains" to many in the sixth decade of the present century.

HOW LIBERTY GROWS.

Liberty is a curious growth. It feeds on the very things which are intended to kill it. But this, after all, illustrates a law of life. Real development is from the inner to the outer—from the heart to the physical and intellectual life. Bigotry moves in the very opposite direction, and when it reaches the heart it often corrupts it, or else changes it to a heart of stone. It follows the way of death, while liberty follows the way of life; one is ab extra and the other is ab intra. If the hand is bitten by a venomous serpent the course of death immediately sets in from the outer to the inner, from the circumference to the center; but all the forces of life run the other way. Bigotry is always at first an outside deformity, often a mere poisonous speck. But it is precisely at that time that it is most easily seen; for afterwhile it becomes assimilated to all that makes up the man, and though it is now a more powerful force than it was in the beginning, it does not appear so much a deformity as it did in the first place. We may get used to even a wart on the nose by constant association with it.

There are still men among the Disciples who are fond of heresy hunting, but these for the most part belong to the age of which I am writing, or else they have inherited the peculiar theology which, when measured mathematically, makes five equal to ten.

This class of men, no matter when or where they live, are always practically condemning themselves in the very thing wherein they accuse others. They fight human creeds with all the powers they possess as long as creeds are the product of other people; but these same heresy hunters do not hesitate to make a creed whenever they wish to try the faith or practice of their fellowmen. In short, they will not allow any one to make a creed for them, but they are more than willing to make a creed for all the rest of the world. This was exactly the spirit manifested by the creed-makers in the days when bigotry had its birth among the Disciples.

MR. CAMPBELL'S POSITION.

Surely, Mr. Campbell was in no way responsible for the birth of heresy hunting among his brethren. From the very beginning he had recognized the peculiar state of religious society with which he had to deal. He saw plainly that the church, when considered from the New Testament point of view, had gradually gone into an apostasy and that the movement in which he was engaged had for its object the restoration of the primitive gospel and order of things. But he did not expect complete success in this restoration until there was ample time for thought, investigation and action. Meanwhile, he was always willing to deal charitably with honest, religious people, no matter how far wrong they might have been when tried by his understanding of New Testament teaching. In short, he was thoroughly convinced that there were Christians among the sects, notwithstanding these sects themselves occupied a false position when compared with what Christ and his apostles had taught upon the true attitude that Christians should occupy. It was from this point of view that he plead for Christian union. There would have been no sense in talking about Christian union if he had not recognized Christians outside of the churches with which he was specially identified.

As evidence of Mr. Campbell's liberal spirit I will make two extracts from his debate with Mr. Rice:

"No good, no religious, moral or virtuous man, can perish through our views or principles. Our theory thunders terrors to none but the self-condemned. Human responsibility, in my views and doctrines, always depends upon and is measured by human ability. It is so, certainly, under the gospel. The man born blind will not be condemned for not seeing, nor the deaf for not hearing. The man who never heard the gospel cannot disobey it; and he who through any physical impossibility is prevented from any ordinance is no transgressor. It is only he who knows and has power to do his Master's will that shall be punished for disobedience. None suffer, in our views, but those who are willfully ignorant or negligent of their duty. Natural ability, time, place and circumstances are all to be taken into account; and none but those who sin against these are, on our theory, to perish with an everlasting destruction 'from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power.'" . . .

"I circumscribe not the divi ne philanthropy—the divine grace. I dare not say that there is no salvation in the Church of Rome or in that of Constantinople; though certainly Protestants do not regard them as churches builded upon the foundation of apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief corner stone. In all the Protestant parties there are many excellent spirits that mourn over the desolation of Zion—that love the gospel and its Author most sincerely. My soul rejoices in the assurance that there are very many excellent spirits groaning under the weight of human tradition and error, who are looking for redemption from these misfortunes before a long time."

Now if it be true that Mr. Campbell was liberal toward those outside of his own communion it is equally true that he had the most supreme contempt for heresy hunting among his own brethren. The principles of the Reformation for which he contended guaranteed the fullest liberty of thought and the most untrammeled right of individual interpretation which any one could possibly claim legtimately for himself.

THE TRUE SPIRIT OF THE REFORMATION.

Mr. Campbell never stated his doctrine of freedom in any special formula, so far as I have noticed, but I think his teaching may be fairly summarized to mean that he claimed (1) the right to think, speak and act for himself without recognizing the right of any obtrusive interference from any source whatever, and (2) what he claimed for himself he was perfectly willing to grant to every other person.

This was the spirit of our people in the main up to the period when heresy hunting was born. Since then they have been trammeled, not only by influences from without, but also by influences from within. Very small questions in some cases have been magnified into undue importance, while some of the larger questions have been discussed by a few with a narrowness of spirit quite unworthy of any great cause.

Nevertheless, be it said to the credit of our people that these heresy hunters have, for the most part, received scanty approbation, and upon the whole it cannot be denied that their spirit has always been in harmony with the great principles upon which the Reformation was founded.

It is also true that most of the men in this movement who have made much impression upon their contemporaries have been men who have always advocated a liberal policy, both within and without the community. Before the sixth decade of the present century had ended the battle for liberty had been practically won, and consequently since that time the flowing tide has alway been with those who believe in freedom of thought, freedom of speech and the right of individual interpretation.

I am not, I think, overestimating the tendency of the period under consideration. In proof of this I have only to refer to an article in the April number of Lard's Quarterly for 1865. After stating and discussing several things which were regarded as departures from the faith of the Disciples the editor says:

"The spirit of innovation is a a peculiar spirit. While coming in it is the meekest and gentlest of spirits; only it is marvelously firm and persistent. But when going out no term but fiendish will describe it. It comes in humming the sweetest notes of Zion; it goes out amid the ruin it works, howling like an exorcised demon. At first it is supple as a willow twig; you can bend it, mold it, shape it to anything; only it will have its way. But when once it has fully got its way, then mark how it keeps its footing. It now calls for reason, for argument, for Scripture, but no more has it an ear for reason, argument or Scripture than has the image of Baal. Argue with the spirit of innovation, indeed! I would as soon be caught cracking syllogisms over the head of the Man of Sin. Never. Rebuke it in the name of the Lord; if it go not out—expel it. This only will cure it.

"He is a poor observer of men and things who does not see slowly growing up among us a class of men who can no longer be satisfied with the ancient gospel and the ancient order of things. These men must have changes; and silently they are preparing the mind of the brotherhood to receive changes. Be not deceived, brethren, the devil is not sleeping. If you refuse to see the danger till ruin is upon you, then it will be too late. The wise seaman catches the first whiff of the distant storm and adjusts his ship at once. Let us profit by his example."

This is very strong language, but it is fairly representative of the language used by certain scribes and speakers contemporaneous witn the editor of the Quarterly. That it did not produce mischief in the end cannot surely be ascribed to what the language clearly implies, but to the inherent strength of a cause which was meant to battle against just such influences as are indicated in the heresy hunting proclivities of those self-constituted keepers of the faith represented by the language we have quoted from one of their leading periodicals of that period.

OUR MINISTRY IN THE SOUTH.

JAMES H. BROOKS.

This is a great subject. Many interesting phases of it come up for consideration of the observant and the thoughtful. It grows in interest on one looking up the history of our ministers and their work of other years, and especially so to him who would obtain accurate knowledge of all classes of our preachers of this present time, and then consider what the prospects are for the rank and file of them, say for the next quarter of a century. One brother says: "The matters you mention are of vital importance to our cause in the South, and ought to be of interest to every Disciple of Christ. . . . Our people in this state, as a rule, are not wealthy. Neither have they been schooled in liberality except in a few localities. However, we are growing in the right direction, and capable and faithful men in the main will be supported. If we were better preachers we would have better churches." I would add, If we had better churches often we would have better preachers. The church often makes or unmakes the pastor.

Intellectual endowment and culture are indispensable to the highest success in any noble endeavor. Spirituality is an acquirement that others might dispense with; for the minister it is his power, that gives him influence with man and enables him many a time to bear his own burden while he fulfills the "royal law" in bearing the heavier burdens of a score of other men. To the carnal minded it may appear strange doctrine to tell him a preacher's spiritual, moral and intellectual condition frequently depends upon his financial condition. To a large extent a minister's financial standing is the measure of his moral, social and religious standing in the opinion of the general public, of many of his own brethren, and especially of his creditors. Too often right in this is found to be the preacher's downfall. Success is dependent on other things save his readiness to be translated.

Recently one of our secretaries wrote the brotherhood in his state: "Now, my good brethren, what we want in this state is men and money, and especially right now, money. If you will give us money, we will show you what the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ can do in this state in a year." But one says, Good men are always in demand. Granted, but their financial support is not always forthcoming. Thus it happens that good men from time to time change locations, presumably for lack of support. A long letter lies before me that I should like to quote in full, but in this connection I use only a part: "Deep-seated prejudice exists in all countries, of all climes, but here in the Southern states it takes on a peculiar phase. The prejudices of our Southern people are deep-seated and tenaciously stubborn; caused by past circumstances and conditions, which it is not my province to mention in this connection. Suffice it to say that in all the older towns and communities, where the most substantial wealth is to be found, the people are extremely slow to countenance any teaching which calls upon them to forsake the religious practice of their ancestors. In such towns and communities a faithful but weak congregation of Disciples may exist for years under the most able preaching, and not have a single addition. There are many such congregations in the South, having had an existence for over fifty years. . . . .Many of the members fail to pay as much as they could afford, feeling that it is a useless waste of money to pay for preaching which is seemingly so barren of results. In this connection it is well to note the fact that all of our recent gains in the South have been in the new towns, which have grown up in the mining sections and along the lines of new railroads. The reason for this is that the building up of a new town means the loosening of family ties and the breaking off of old associations and church relationships. Again, in order to fully appreciate the difficulties which confront the (white) preacher of the South, we must not forget the fact that in the very best sections a large proportion of the population is made up of negroes. In these country districts, where lands are most productive, the plantations are larger and white families comparatively few. As a result the audiences in the country churches are very small. The labor of the country is mostly done by these negroes, and they have their own churches and support their own preachers. If this laboring population was a white population it would give much greater numerical strength to our country congregations, and thus add very materially to the preacher's financial support. It would also lessen the burden of his labors and make his work much more pleasant. As it is, the preacher's work is laborious in traveling over so much territory to reach the white people; and he is at the same time deprived of the small contributions of the working people, which always go far toward making up the good collections for religious purposes. If he expects to build up a congregation of numerical strength in the country here in the South, he must go to the hills (away from the river bottoms) where the lands are poor and the people unable to pay much salary, for it is in the poor sections of the South that dense white populations are found. . . . Suffice it to say, in spite of difficulties, progress is being made in many places, and at some time in the South Southern preachers will have a smoother road than they have now."

In the South we need more preaching. This can be seen by the thoughtful in considering the following facts, taken from the yearbook for '98: Arkansas has a population of 1,128,179. We have in the state only 37,000 Disciples, 400 churches and 200 preachers who give all their time to the ministry. Louisiana has a population of 1,118,587. We have only 1,200 Disciples, 24 churches and 7 preachers who give all their time to the ministry. Mississippi has a population of 1,239,600. We have only 7,000 Disciples, 146 churches and 43 preachers who give all their time to the ministry. It should be kept in mind that not a few of our Southern churches are practically without pastoral care.

In North Carolina there is only one Disciple to every 105 of the population; only 26 preachers are given wholly to the ministry. In South Carolina there is only one Disciple to every 1,151 of the population; only 19 preachers are given wholly to the ministry. In Florida only five preachers spend their entire time in preaching "the old Jerusalem gospel" to a people among whom there is only one Disciple to every 1,275 of the entire population. The proportion is somewhat better in Tennessee, Alabama and Georgia than in some of the states given. "There is much land yet to be possessed." How shall an aggregate population of nearly one and a half millions hear the gospel by about seven hundred preachers? How shall this small number preach except they be sent—sustained?

In the South we need a closer fellowship among the hosts of those who claim to be after the ancient order of things. There is nothing more beautiful than the fraternal relations of the few who are in hearty cooperation in furthering the gospel.

In the nine states mentioned herein we have somewhat over one hundred and twenty-eight thousand members. We are walking too far apart. We need something in addition to our present arrangements to bring us in touch. Only a few attend our annual state convention. Our masses are untouched, and hence not influenced by the good work done at such meetings.

These gatherings of the few are "cooperative, educative and stimulative," to the few who attend and, let us hope, to some who may read or hear of them. It would seem that "quarterly meetings," "fifth Sunday meetings," or mass meetings, held from time to time, would result in good. At such meetings Sunday-school, Y. P. S. C. E., missionary work and such like could have attention. The qualifications and work of the elders, the deacons, the pastor and the evangelist might be profitably discussed.

Every Southern state needs more evangelists. Says one: "Our state evangelist cannot give the needed attention to all destitute points and cannot be as thorough in his canvass for funds as is necessary. This would be somewhat remedied had we an evangelist in each of the three districts [he suggests his state be districted] to cooperate with the state evangelist." One of our ex-state secretaries recently said: "But our worst need now is a general evangelist for these Gulf States, to work in connection with our state evangelists and pastors of the stronger churches. If the General Board could put an evangelist, second to none in the brotherhood, in these Southern states, I verily believe, after close observation and much experience, that he would almost make his salary from the start, and in a few years the most liberal contributions to missions from all the churches would be the result of his labors." Again, it appears to me that we have made too little of this excellent recommendation: "Interest special congregations in particular mission points, and have them take these points as their field; the work to be done through the Home Board."

Now here comes a letter from one of the wisest and best among us, saying, "If I can get the time, I will write a short article on the work in this [his] state, making an effort to show why we have so little to show for the vast amount of hard labor that has been done in this state by men of superior ability." In the words of one state evangelist, "The outlook is encouraging. The improvement and growth can best be seen by those on whose hearts the burden hangs heaviest."

Take away from mankind their vanity and their ambition, and there would be but few claiming to be heroes or patriots.

"THE MYSTESY OF GOD SHALL BE FINISHED."

T. H. BLENUS.

When those events that were announced to the Apostle John in the apocalyptic vision by the seven thunders have occurred; when those things predicted by the seventh trumpet, which was soon to sound, shall have been accomplished; when time itself shall cease and be swallowed up in an unchanging, unending eternity, and the "mystery of God," the darkness in which the dispensations of his providence towards the churches and individuals are so often involved is dispelled, we will see in the light of the eternal dawn that "he has done all things well."

There are "secret things which belong to God," into which we cannot pry, which have been sealed to us, but the beauties, the loveliness and the excellency of his work in redemption are not among those secret things; no voice from heaven forbids us to read and study and dwell upon them, or to communicate them to others; they are declared in tones louder than the voice of the seven thunders, yet in accents sweeter than the harps of seraphs. They comfort, console and rejoice us in life, give us triumph over death, hell and the grave, and will be the subject of our praise throughout eternity. The mystery of God will be finished, when time shall be no longer. It once did not exist; there was a day, a year, a moment that was the first, and there shall be a year, a day, a moment that will be the last; an eternity preceded the birth of time, an eternity will succeed its death; the visible frame of nature, the heavens and the earth shall be no more, changes and seasons shall cease to exist; when the sun shall be torn from the heavens, when the moon shall be changed into blood, there will then only remain a state of unchangeable joy for the blessed, or of unceasing wretchedness for the wicked.

It is a delightful thought to remember this teaching; that hereafter "the mystery of God will be finished." There are many things around us now in grace and providence inexplicable; but then perhaps in the fullest and most complete sense shall we find the fulfillment of the words of our Savior to his disciples: "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shall know hereafter." We shall preceive that everything which occurred to us or the church was consonant with the divine perfections; was demanded under the circumstances by infinite wisdom, justice and goodness; was necessary for our eternal joy and happiness. "Now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face; now we know in part, but then shall we know even as also we are known."

While looking back over the history of the conduct of the Almighty towards the world, while retracing the steps of our lives with the darkness of the mystery removed, we shall be enabled to say, "Clouds and darkness were round about him, but justice, mercy and faithfulness were ever the habitation of his throne and the source of his conduct." In anticipation of that blessed period we can now calmly trust in God, and if we find mysteries we cannot solve in nature, in providence and in the Scriptures, we remember that God is infinite; that his plans extend from eternity to eternity; that we who "are but of yesterday know nothing," but that the period is hastening when "in God's light we shall see light." We can afford to wait with filial trust and adoring confidence till it pleases him to remove the veil and secure the happiness of that man of whom the Savior speaks when he says, "Blessed is he whosoever is not offended in me."

When our dearest hopes are blasted, when our fondest expectations are withered, when our plans for usefulness are frustrated, when all around us is dark and perplexing, still, instead of repining or murmuring, we will trust in that infinite wisdom and mercy presiding over the universe, knowing that the thorne of God is established in the heavens and that the Redeemer has all authority in heaven and on earth. Blind and ignorant, we often wish for those things that would be injurious to us and the cause dear to us. We therefore rejoice in the superintendence of the Allwise; the Lord reigns and we rejoice. His mystery will in the glorious hereafter be fulfilled; darkness shall be dissipated, and in the light and glory of heaven we shall hereafter exclaim with adoring wonder and thankfulness, "He hath done all things well."

THE GRACE OF HUMILITY.

AUSTIN HUNTER.

Humility is one of the fundamental elements of a Christian character. It has found its highest expression in the life of our Lord. His teachings are full of references to it, and his example is a stinging rebuke to our pride. One of the apostles exhorts us to be "clothed with humility," to wear it as a constant garment, that it may be a permanent part of our Christian life.

Humility does not consist in self-depreciation; it rather consists in willingness to do lowly deeds and to occupy lowly places for the good of man and the glory of God. In the thirteenth chapter of John, where our Savior washed his disciples' feet, thus giving us a striking exhibition of humility, we have this language: "Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he came forth from God and goeth unto God, riseth from supper and took a towel and girded himself." This language is significant because it teaches us the true nature of humility. Our Lord was conscious of his duty, his exalted nature and position, yet he washed his disciples' feet, partly because the circumstances required that some one perform this lowly task and partly to rebuke the pride of his disciples who were clamoring for the chief seats and places. The connection, therefore, of Christ's consciousness of his duty and his washing the disciples' feet throws much light on the nature of humility. The humble man is conscious of his talents. If he has ability or powers surpassing his fellowman he knows it. It is not necessary for him to underrate himself. Yet, while he is conscious of his talents he is always willing to occupy the lowliest places if he can thus be of service to man and glorify God.

While he may be conscious of his talents, yet his standard of measurement is with God rather than with man. The Pharisee was not humble because he compared himself with the publican and said, "I thank thee that I am not as other men, . . . or even as this publican." His standard of measurement was wrong. He should have measured himself with God. When Job was in the presence of God he fell upon his face and said, "I abhor myself." Self-righteousness and conceit arise from wrong standards of measurement.

Humility should be manifest in our knowledge. If this be true, there will be no place for self-conceit. When we compare what we know, not with what others know, but with what may be known, we feel our humility. One of the pioneers of thought said, "I feel that I am but a child by the seaside, picking up a pebble here and there, while the great ocean of truth lies undiscovered before me." Humility in knowledge will always create this feeling, and we will realize that, after all, we are not so much in advance of our fellowmen in thought compared with the sum-total of knowledge. This humility in knowledge will, therefore, always insure respect for the opinions of others.

Humility should be manifest in our works. It is not our glory, but God's, that we are seeking. While we should rejoice in our success and report the good news, yet it should be done in a becoming spirit of humility. When one proudly reports his meeting as the "greatest meeting" ever held in a certain place or state, etc., it may be he has the wrong standard of measurement.

Humility is the unalterable condition of honor. The men who have attained the highest places have been humble men. When Chas. Spurgeon was offered $50,000 to deliver fifty lectures in this country he replied, "I had rather stay in London and save fifty souls." God honors such men. Mr. Moody has turned away time and again when people have congratulated him on his sermons. Our Savior set forth this principle, that humility is the condition of honor, when he said of the publican in contrast with the proud Pharisee, "This man went down to his house justified rather than the other, for whosoever humbleth himself shall be exalted, and whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased." And concerning our Lord himself it has been said, "Because he humbled himself and became obedient to the death of the cross, therefore hath God highly exalted him and given him a name that is above every name."

Cleveland, O.

A new feature of the coming Christian Endeavor Convention at Detroit will be a Christian Endeavor Museum, under the care of Merrett B. Holley, of Traverse City, Mich. If you have any interesting topic cards, convention souvenirs, reminders of Christian Endeavor in odd places, objects used in Junior Societies, banners, buttons, committee helps of all kinds, posters, programs, portraits—anything that will give any one an idea or a helpful method of work or a bit of inspiration for brighter or better service—you are requested to send it to Mr. Holley, and he will take the best care of it and return it to you after the convention is over. Mr. Holley already has a large collection of his own which he will display at the convention.

Our Budget.

—Our missionary offerings are growing.

—The Master's kingdom is expanding.

—The Bible-school interests of Missouri are focalized at Plattsburg this week.

—It is doubtless true that some phases of a so-called Christianity are becoming obsolete, as some affirm, but there are other phases that are becoming more alive and prominent than ever before in the history of the church. We are entering that age in which Christianity is beginning to work in the world as the leaven in the meal.

—Dr. B. B. Tyler has got so near to Dallas, Tex., as near as Colorado Springs, Col., that the Courier is absorbing the influence of his intellect. It has touched the hem of his garment and virtue has gone out from Dr. Tyler to the Courier and its readers. In the June 1st number of the Courier is an excellent article by Dr. Tyler on "The Death of Christ."

—The Y. M. C. A. convention recently held at Grand Rapids, Mich., was characterized by its large attendance, enthusiasm, the devout spirit and its able speakers. The address of Gov. Mount, of Indiana, was especially remarked upon for its bold, clear presentation of truth in the domain of civics. The addresses of Dr. Buckley, Anthony Comstock and J. Wilbur Chapman, et al., were also commended for their moral and spiritual strength. The undenominational character of Y. M. C. A. and Y. P. S. C. E. conventions are peculiarly adapted to great freedom of thought in the broad field of Christian truth and social and civic righteousness, and we are glad to see them commanding the ablest men of the age to address them. It demonstrates the possibility of a better unity among the different religious bodies.

—We have received a copy of Isaac Selby's book, "From Atheism to Christianity," and find it an excellent work. It is a strong defense of Christianity against the attacks of modern infidelity. As is known to many of our readers, Bro. Selby was for ten years an enemy of the Christian religion, opposing it vigorously by pen and tongue. But his eyes were opened to the truth and he is now more vigorously defending that which at one time he was seeking to destroy. Those who have heard Bro. Selby's lectures pronounce them among the strongest vindications of the Christian religion yet heard from the platform or pulpit. This book is a revised English edition and contains his best thought on the things of God revealed to us by his Holy Spirit. It can not be without healthful influence upon its readers.

—The eyes of all nations are fixed upon China as the world's next great marketplace. It is like a great basin cut in the earth's surface and ready to receive water from any source that may be opened up. The probability is that all the leading nations will soon be pouring their products into this great land by ship and by rail and that it will soon be as full of the civilized products and convenient methods of life as the surrounding nations. Then what? Probably the greater question of greater international imprvements will one day be circumstancially forced upon the so-called civilized nations of the world. The skimming process of the commercial merchants of the world cannot last always.

—An Ecumenical Conference on Foreign Missions is announced to be held in New York City, April 21 to May 1, 1900. All the Protestant missionary societies and missions of the world are invited to a representation in this conference. Ex-Presinent Harrison is proposed for the president of the conference, and a host of committees have already been appointed. The addresses and the summary of the discussions are to be published in a book within one hundred days of its adjournment. This body will make no laws for anybody, but will probably be the greatest conference on missions ever held in the world's history and will certainly open the way to a closer fellowship of the Protestant churches in missionary work and a speedier conversion of the world to Christ.

—The gain in the offerings for Home Missions for the first ten days of June is $1,031.69. At this rate the gain for the entire month of June ought to be over $3,000 and the entire offering for the month over $10,000.

—It requires but a casual glance at the program of the Christian Endeavor convention to be held at Detroit next month to assure one of a convention of unusual force and enthusiasm. A new celebrity in the convention will be Charles M. Sheldon, whose book, "In His Steps," has made him one of the most popular religious authors of the day. But the program literally sparkles with illustrious names and the convention will certainly be a par-excellent one.

—D. A. Wickizer's criticism on the criticism on Prof. Willett's C. E. Reading Course book in this paper under the heading, "Are We Following in the Old Path," is certainly to the point and well taken. Straining out the gnats is not a very edifying business to engage in, especially when the weightier things of the law, the better things of the book or sermon, are neglected.

—We present our readers a face this week which will be familiar to many, especially to Missourians. We do not wonder that some of our Missouri subscribers have requested us to give on our first page the picture of G. W. Longan. Born in Chariton county, Mo., Dec. 31, 1819, he fell asleep in Christ at Sweet Springs, Mo., near his 71st birthday, in 1890. He was a preacher and a writer of great ability, a lover of truth and of his brethren. He was one of God's noblemen. Missouri owes much to him. The whole brotherhood was his debtor. Being dead, he yet speaks. We shall cherish his memory as long as we love truth and high courage.

—The Christian, published in St. John, N. B., for June, is accompanied by a supplement in red ink appealing to "whosoever will" for help for the building of the Main St. Christian Church, north end of that city. On May 25th the north end of St. John was destroyed by fire and in this ruined district were many brethren of the St. John Christian Church. Work on the foundation for this north end church building was begun on the morning of the fire and now that so many of its members and friends who had promised to help have lost all that they had this appeal is made public that those who can from without may rally to their support. To be able to continue this work help must be received at once, and if any of our readers can send any amount they will contribute to an important work and assist brethren now under a great burden and in sore distress. Anything sent should be addressed to J. Chas. Appel, Saint John, N. B.

—There are theories to burn on how to reach the masses, how to enlist young men in church work, and kindred subjects, but the masses are still unreached, the young men still avoid the churches and the theories remain theories still. Theories are helpful by way of suggestion, but of themselves they are powerless to move men, young or old, toward Christ. In some way they must come in contact with the great moral and spiritual forces of the universe. It is the contrary powers that keep them from the churches and these can be broken only by the greater power of God—the gospel of Christ. They must be made conscious of the dangers of sin and the supremacy of a godly life before they will care for the church. When men come to see that their greatest enemy is sin and their best friend Christ, there is hope for their repentance. The more helpful Christianity can be made to them the better hope that they will appreciate it.

—We publish a paragraph in another part of this paper from the American Review of Reviews for June under the head, "The Railroads and the Public Welfare" that is worthy of some attention because of its presentation of a view of this question that has not yet obtained very wide acceptance among the masses.

—Christian College Chronicle for May chronicles many indications of growth; in fact, it reads as if Christian College was enjoying an actual boom. New buildings are promised by the opening of the fall term to accommodate the demands for admittance into this college family and other signs of heathful growth.

—W. E. Garrison, professor of Church History in the Bible department of Butler College, Irvington, Ind., and one of our editorial staff, was in the city this week visiting his parents previous to his trip to Germany. He will sail from New York on Saturday of this week on the Amsterdam for Rotterdam and has promised us a letter per week during his trip. Our readers have not forgotten the interesting letters from Dr. W. E. Garrison when abroad last summer and will anticipate with pleasure his promised letters on this tour.

—Through the Chicago Record of June 8th we are informed of the death of Abraham A. Devore at his home 3233 Rhodes Ave., Chicago, Ill. His sickness covers a period of fifteen years and his death was not unexpected by his friends. He left a widow, two daughters and two sons. Of the many circles of life in which he moved, in none will he be missed more than in the church of which he was a member in Chicago.

—The annual river excursion for the benefit of the Christian Orphans' Home will take place on the 22nd of the present month. A large boat has been secured, great preparations made and popular prices fixed for the occasion, and a good time is expected. All the Bible-schools and churches of our people in this city participate in these excursions, and they are a source of revenue for the Home. Efforts are being made to have the largest attendance this year, or at least the largest returns, for the Home. Could you or your school not send for a bunch of these excursion tickets for the benefit of the Home, whether you can go or not? Write to John Burns, care of this office.

—In an article by Rev. O. P. Gifford on "The Twentieth Century Ideal of Manhood," in The Comming Age for June, he says: "A man's ideal is measured by his attitude toward the world's need. There are three attitudes toward the world's need: 1. Use it, profit by it, exploit it; 2. Indifference to it; 3. Ministry to it. If it were possible to get statistics on the subject, it would be interesting to know what proportion of the people occupy respectively these various attitudes to the world's need. It is safe to say, however, that a very large proportion occupy the attitudes numbered 1 and 2 in the foregoing. There are not a few who look upon the extremity of their neighbor as an opportunity for personal gain; but the larger number, doubtless, are simply indifferent to the world's need. It is understood, of course, what Christ's attitude was to the world's need. He ministered to it. He came "not to be ministered unto, but to minister." This, of course, defines the attitude which all Christ's disciples should occupy toward the need of the world. If we are to be Christians we must follow Christ's example. If his controlling purpose in life was to minister to the world's need, that should be our controlling motive. The simple question, then, comes to every Christian, How may I best minister to the world's need? This is only another form of the question asked by Saul of Tarsus at his conversion, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" The man who has never asked this question, in all sincerity, and sought to find the answer, and to be loyal to that answer, can hardly be called a Christian.

The receipts from Children's Day are very encouraging. For the first seven days of June there was a gain of 188 contributing schools and also a gain of $3,733.41 in the receipts. The Sunday-schools are expected to give $10,000 this year.

—The annual meeting of the Christian Churches of McDonough and adjoining counties, Ill., will be held with the Old Bedford Church, at Blandinsville, June 29, 1899. A good program has been published. A. R. Adams is the pastor.

—The editor of this paper regrets that he cannot be at the Plattsburg Bible-school Convention this week. Warned by symptoms of failing health he feels it necessary to leave the city at once for the cooler breezes of Lake Michigan. We are also sorry that W. D. Cree, the superintendent of our subscription department, and F. M. Call, the business manager of this house, who had intended going to the convention, are prevented, the former by the sickness of his wife, and the latter by the marriage of his daughter, Miss Daisy, at Mt. Cabanne Church on Wednesday evening. However, we are sure that the brethren will have a good convention and undertake still greater things for Christ in Missouri.

—A copy of the handsome catalogue of the Eugene Divinity School for 1899-1900 has come to hand, and we are pleased with the indications of permanency and growing influence which it bears. The endowment asked for and needed rests upon good and urgent reasons, and we trust will be raised at an early date.

—From the bottom of my heart I want to thank you for your article in CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of May 18th on "The Partisan Spirit." Those are brave words, true words, TIMELY words. Here is the issue, and I fear many do not realize it. There are those among us, who while pleading Christian unity, utterly fail to exhibit its spirit. While many are beholding "the larger vision," yet still to others the words of Christ to his disciples are applicable: "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of." W. S. LOWE.

Manhattan, Kas.

—No book was ever printed in so many forms, translations and variations as the Bible, and yet these variations continue to appear. A new translation of the New Testament is now appearing in England and America called "The Emphasized New Testament." A system of signs have been adopted to indicate the various degrees of emphasis that is supposed, by the translator, Joseph Bryant Rotherham, to belong to various words, phrases and paragraphs. A copy of this New Testament may be had of John Wiley & Sons, New York City. The design of this translation is "to set forth the exact meaning, the proper terminology and the graphic style of the sacred original; it is arranged to show at a glance narrative, speech, parallelism and logical analysis, and is emphasized throughout after the idioms of the Greek tongue. It also contains select references and an appendix of notes."

"In Union There is Strength."

True strength consists in the union, the harmonious working together, of every part of the human organism. This strength can never be obtained if the blood is impure. Hood's Sarsaparilla is the standard prescription for purifying the blood.

—The Foreign Society has just received special personal gifts, amounting to $2,000. We rejoice in these larger gifts for world-wide missions. The gain in offerings to date now amounts to $13,636.60. The Foreign Society is making the best record in its history this year and the same is true of our Home Society to date.

—The New Voice for june 3 is exceedingly severe upon Secretary Alger for dodging the responsibility of the operative failure of the anti-army canteen bill. It closes an editorial in that number on his failure to make the bill effective with the following paragraph:

The New Voice was one of the first papers in the country to protest against holding Secretary Alger personally responsible for the disease and death in our army camps during the war. We said last summer, as we say now, that the major part of it was due to the fact that the volunteers did not know how to take care of themselves and the officers did not know how to direct them. But for the continued existence of the canteen evil we do hold Secretary Alger directly responsible. It is a shame and an outrage, and it rests upon him even more than upon the Attorney-General.

—The Advance gives the following illustration of the far-reaching results of the trust problem. If the benefits of the economical phases of that question could accrue to the consumer, in part at least, much more could be said in justification of trusts than at present:

A new phase of the trust problem is the complaint coming from hotel proprietors throughout the country of the loss in business because the trusts have lessened the number of commercial travelers. As many as 75,000 men, it is stated, have lost their positions as a result of the recent great combinations. The social readjustments rendered necessary constitute one of the most serious phases of the problem, and, it is needless to say, will have very important political influence.

—I want to thank you for the editorial, "Working at the Certainties." It was timely and helpful. VERNON J. ROSE.

Columbia, Mo., June 5, '99.

—I am so favorably impressed with the article, "Silence, Reverence, Worship," that appeared in the last number of your excellent paper, that I wish to express approval of it. Surely, the adaptation of the ideas suggested therein could result in nothing but great spiritual benefit to all Christians, and great honor to His name. Cannot the essay in question be published in some form that will bring it to more general notice of all our people? God help us to a better understanding of these things. F. P. D.

Cozad, Neb., May 21.

—The Salvation Army has just been here for three weeks, and have 34 "converts." Probably all will go to the Methodists, as the S. A. naturally joins in with them. Their preaching is as devoid of Bible and reason as the shouting of the priests of Baal. Why will such preaching move people, and not a soul be touched during the whole of one of our meetings? Is it possible that the New Testament is not a guide to go by, but simply a record of a bygone and obsolete age and religion? Why is error blessed, and truth repulsed at every turn? Perhaps we need the earnestness of the S. A. Nothing could divert them from their purpose. One young lady here requested one of the young and handsome soldiers to call at her house. Perceiving her interest in him he said, "Madam, I am not here for that purpose."—Extract from a Personal Letter to the Editor.

It is certainly an unusual meeting among us, when "not a soul is touched" by it. The rule is, under anything like ordinary circumstances, that many souls are not only "touched," but brought to open confession and obedience. Nevertheless, there are enough failures, not only in special evangelistic services, but in the ordinary preaching of the gospel, to justify the inquiry raised in the foregoing extract. No doubt the deep moral earnestness of the Salvation Army is the chief element of its success. As a rule its preachers are innocent of any homiletic methods, or of any system of biblical truth. But they have learned that men are sinners and are going down to hell in impenitence, and that Jesus Christ died for them, loves them, and is able to save to the uttermost all who will cast themselves upon his mercy, seeking peace and pardon. This they believe and preach with all their heart. They are deeply and profoundly in earnest, believe in the efficacy of prayer, and talk directly to the "common people" in language they can understand. There are some things one can learn from the Salvation Army.

—The following clipping is from the New York Tribune of Monday, May 27:

During the Christian Endeavor Convention in Detroit, Mich., in July, a communion service will be held on the 9th of that month in one of the convention tents by the Central Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), when it is expected that several thousand members will receive communion by C. B. Newman, the minister of that church, assisted by from forty to fifty deacons. It will probably be the largest communion service ever held in the world. The Disciples of Christ have also secured the tent for a denominational rally on Thursday, July 6.

—The Herald and Presbyter, May 31, says:

The total loss from operating the New York Presbyterian Building from the beginning to March 1, 1899, has, according to the reports of the boards, been: Home Board, $60,558.15; Foreign Board, $51,823.40; total, $112,381.55. The loss since Jan. 1, 1899, has been: Home Board, three months, $2,063.88; Foreign Board, four months, $1,593.94. The building is now nearly all rented. Mr. Dodge, the newly elected president of the Home Board, expressed great confidence that the building will soon be a paying investment. The cost of the building to date has been: Home Board, $945,500; Foreign Board, $884,771.64; total, $1,830,271.61.

—An article in the Courier of June 1st, from A. S. Henry, financial agent for Add-Ran University, indicates that the University is in sore distress. He says:

We owe $22,000 on property and wills that amount to in first cost $168,000, and we are at the point now if we fail to place bonds against the University building to at least cover the debt we lose it all, and the school will not open another session. Now I give fair warning to every one who reads this article, we must raise either in bonds or in gifts $22,000 at the state meeting, June 5-8, or the school must be discontinued. It cannot be run as it has been. . . . I am certain we cannot afford to undertake to carry on the school another session as it has been heretofore, for it is a signal failure and does the Christian Church in Texas more harm than good to conduct a school with half-paid teachers, half-finished buildings and half-equipped departments. Now knowing as well as I do that unless we pay our debts and improve our building, the school will simply die on our hands for the want of patronage and support, I recommend as a matter of business and as the only honorable thing to be done, that we abandon the school at Waco and sell the property, pay off our debts and put the remainder, if any, in a building we can handle at some point where we will be appreciated and patronized. It is my opinion that a city of 8,000 to 15,000 population would offer us large inducements for the permanent establishment of our state school.

Sad as it would be to lose this school, the position of Bro. Henry is right. If a community, state or brotherhood does not want a school bad enough to support it, remove the candlestick. This is the only thing that can be honorably done under such circumstances. But we hope that these "final" and strong words of Bro. H. will stir up the brotherhood of Waco and of Texas to save the school. Such magnificent buildings should not be sold for a song.

Francis M. Bruner.

There is a door through which all must pass. It opens and closes but once. It slowly opens, we pass within, it closes and is forever sealed. We stand and look at the door where our friend disappeared as though we expected his return, but he comes not. We stretch out the hand and call his name, but it is all in vain. "Nevermore" is written on that door, and we turn away with trembling heart. So passed F. M. Bruner from the sight of men, and we have turned away with a sense of irreparable loss.

But a little while ago we sat in the church and listened to words of eulogy and comfort. Yes, he was a good man, a steadfast friend, an earnest worker, one who had fought the good fight and kept the faith. We listened to the deep-toned organ, the mournful music and gazed on his manly face, and then we went forth. But it seemed almost an empty parade, for he was not there. The poor body had suffered so much, suffered for five years; the loss of one limb, the withering of the other, the frequent surgical operations; it had writhed so often in pain, it had become so emaciated and changed that it was but a small and useless part of him whom we mourned. The spirit, so alive to all things, so full of fire, was not there.

Back to the house, empty now; the hasband and father gone! No more weary watching, no more pain! No more coming of the children to see how father is, no more calling of the neighbors. All is over—all but the widow's loneliness and tears, all but the silent musing over the past, the sacred past! This death was almost a relief; we were almost glad when he reached home at last. We would not have him stay in that decrepit body, we would not have him live in pain.

His last days were full of heroism. In the excitement of battle men forget themselves and die for their country, but it is when they have time to think, when there are appointed unto them weary days and nights, when disease is wasting them, in feebleness and pain, that courage is tested. Hom cheerful he was! How he hailed a new day, how interested in passing events! How he worked, lying there and writing day after day, till his task was finished. I often called to see him during those days and always found him alert and ready to converse, especially on Bible themes. He and Bro. Geo. T. Wilson supplemented each other; the one without legs, the other without eyes. Last year and months before Bro. Wilson pushed the chair and Bro. Bruner told him where to go, and so these good men became fast friends; the one delighted to help a suffering and helpless one, the other delighted in the open sky, the birds, the flowers and the green fields. They often paused to talk or hold discussions by the way. Now Bro. Wilson's occupation is gone.

I often think of Bro. Bruner's life near El Paso, Tex., on a ranch, whither he had gone for his health. He fought for his life without avail; think of him as president of Oskaloosa and of Abingdon Colleges and of his determination to succeed. Those were hard days. Yet with persistence, with courage, how bravely he battled with many difficulties, and this till impaired health drove him into exile. I think of him as he used to visit me at Eureka College, tall, stalwart and in manly maturity; think of him when I first knew him more than thirty years ago and when he was a member of the Illinois Legislature.

His was a strenuous life. He was a worker, a thinker. He was my friend and brother. I feel the loss. I have many new friends, young friends, but the old friends are going one by one. If to me a loss, what must it be to those knew him so well? What to his wife, what to his sons, what to his daughters, who loved him so tenderly, what to his more intimate friends?

Here we have a man growing stronger every year, his mind expanding, his sympathies enlarging. What has become of him? Has he ceased to exist, to think, to feel? Or does he live on, his poor body going back to dust, but his spirit that went up to God still rising higher and higher? We may accept the Scriptures which saith: "He that liveth and believeth in me shall never die."

When such a life ends the event must give us pause. The hands that wrought are folded; the brain that throbbed is pulseless; the heart that felt for all is pained no more. Problems are left unsolved, and plans are not carried out. We follow that life from the boy to the man, from youth to age, and how it is crowded with care and labor, how it struggled and triumphed, how it culminated in manhood, declined in disease and ended, as all must end, in death! And yet we thank God for that life, so full of good works, so sublime in faith, so patient in trial; to the wife a blessed memory, to the sons and daughters a rich legacy, and to all a noble example.

PERSONAL MENTION.

S. M. Perkins will begin the third year of his pastorate at Council Bluffs, Ia., August 1.

A. B. Moore, has recently closed an interesting meeting at Malden, in Southeastern, Mo.

R. M. Marshall, of Belle Vernon, writes that his address for the next few weeks will be at Montra Station, Ohio.

A. Martin delivered the Oddfellow's memorial address in the operahouse at Ashland, O., June 11.

Robert L. Cave, according to the Southern Evangelist, has accepted a call to preach for the church at Rome, Georgia.

H. E. Ballou, late chaplain Kansas State Prison, has accepted a call to preach for the church at Winchester, Kan.

John H. Allen, singer, of Luystown, Mo., is open to engagement for class, chorus or protracted meeting work.

Allan B. Philputt, of Indianapolis, Ind., will deliver the annual address to the graduating class of Butler College, June 22nd. Subject of the address "The Masterful Man."

Robert T. Mathews of the Central Church, Newport, Ky., delivered the commencement address before Madison Institute, Richmond, Ky., on "The Educated Young Women at Home."

J. J. Kathcart, who has recently removed from Springfield to Bushnell, Ill., states that he can be had for regular preaching for any chruch or churches within 100 miles of that city.

W. C. Wheedon, the honored president of the Y. M. C. A., of Honolulu, was present at the recent Y. M. C. A. Convention at Grand Rapids, Mich. He is one of the elders of the church at Honolulu.

J. H. Wright, of Osceola, Ia., was elected president of the eleventh district of the Iowa C. E. Union at a convention recently held at Centerville. Bro. Wright was president of the state union in 1892-'93.

J. T. Le Baron, for one and half years evangelist for Kansas, accepted pastoral work at Marion, which he entered upon May 1st. The congregation has a house and parsonage, free from debt.

J. W. Cozzins, who has been in North Carolina for some time to improve his health, expects to return to Benton City, Mo., this week and to dedicate the new church building there in the near future.

Eld. A. O. Swartwood was called from Waterloo, Neb., to the home of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Swartwood at South Bethany, Ind., to attend the funeral of his sister, Mrs. Logan Talkington, June 7th.

W. C. Weedon, of Honolulu, Bro. Titus, of Topeka, Kan., and Bro. Grove, of Philadelphia, all delegates to the recent Y. M. C. A. convention at Grand Rapids, Mich., worshiped with the Christian Church, of this city, on the Sunday of the convention.

The new pastor at Leon, Ia., H. T. Clark, late of Mt. Pleasant, Ia., with his family is now on the field and reports the outlook hopeful. The Sunday school he says has just voted to take a life membership in the Iowa Christian Convention. Leon, Ia., is to entertain the county convention in August.

Fred E. Hagan, of Pekin, Ill., who has been appointed missionary to Japan by our Foreign Mission Board, will sail for his field of labor sometime during the coming autumn.

Prof. Schoonmaker, who has successfully filled the chair of Ancient Languages in Eureka College during the past two sessions, finished his work there and left for Lexington, Ky., to attend the commencement exercises of his alma mater. He expects to attend the the University of Chicago next year.

Mrs. Sarah Kimball and her daughter, Miss Allie, of Golconda, Ill., were in the city the past few days visiting C. J. Kimball, our proof-reader, paying their respects also to ye assistant editor and his office. Mrs. Kimball is Bro. Kimball's stepmother. They left Tuesday morning for Carbondale, Ill., to attend an educational convention to be held there this week.

Elder J. B. Briney, of Moberly, Mo., recently delivered a course of sixteen sermons at Sweet Springs. Bro. Howell, the pastor, pronounces them the ablest series of sermons he or the people of Sweet Springs ever heard. The old gospel was presented in its simplicity, purity and power. Christian Science, Unitarianism, Swedenborgism and infidelity in general was shown up in their true colors.

J. C. Howell, pastor of the church at Sweet Springs, Mo., has accepted a call to preach for the church at South McAllester, Indian Territory, and enters upon his work there June 15th. Bro. Howell has been doing evangelistic work at South McAllester and this seems to have led up to the call. Missouri loses a faithful preacher in this change, but there is great need for such men in the Indian Territory. Our best wishes go with Bro. Howell to his new field of labor.

J. C. Howell recently visited the Indian Territory in view of locating in a more congenial climate. At Hartshorn he held a two weeks' meeting resulting in six additions. At South McAllester he was robbed of "everything in the world that we possessed at the time, save my gown and shoes." The loss was near three hundred dollars. But this never-to-be-forgotten experience did not deter him from a successful meeting at South McAllester, with 16 additions and a call to that pulpit.

Dr. G. I. Mays and Miss Cora M. Yonker were united in marriage Sunday evening, June 4th, at Central Christian Church, Des Moines, Ia.; the pastor, Dr. Breeden officiating. Dr. Mays is a graduate of the Iowa College of Physicians and Surgeons, of Des Moines, also the Marion-Sims College of Physicians and Surgeons, of this city. Dr. Mays and wife will go South at once, to follow their chosen profession. The best wishes of their many friends follow them.

S. M. Martin called at this office on last Friday, just from his great meeting at Jacksonville, Florida, in which there were 178 additions to the church. Sixty-six of these were from other religious bodies in that city. This is said to be the largest meeting in the history of Jacksonville. It was a meeting the influence of which was felt throughout the city. Bro. Martin's next meeting is to be held in Horton, Kan. He will then go to Dakota until the Jubilee Convention at Cincinnati. He expects his family to return from California and to make his home again in this city, this fall.

Chicago Letter.

Our delightful "lake breeze" has not saved Chicago from a warm "spell." Notwithstanding our daily showers, the thermometer has registered 90 several times during the past week. The vacation season is rapidly approaching. Some of us feel that we cannot afford to take a rest, but those who can should do so. Mr. Carnegie says more failures are caused by overwork than by underwork. Christian business man, "let go," if only for a couple of weeks. Your mind and body has been enduring an intense strain during the past year. Relax; unstring the bow. Too much work without play makes Jack a dull boy.

"This is woman's century." There is much truth in this trite saying. It were nearer the truth, perhaps, to say, This is Christ's century. Christianity has more than doubled numerically and trebled in influence during the nineteenth century, and woman has been coronated by the Man of Galilee. No more helpful and inspiring meetings are held in Chicago than the quarterly meetings of the Chicago Union of auxiliaries to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, in which the Christian Enneavor Societies co-operate. Thursday, June 1st, the auxiliaries of the Christian Churches of Chicago held their twentieth union meeting and were entertained by the Union Christian Church. A fine luncheon and supper were served at a nominal price.

Mrs. J. H. O. Smith has faithfully served as president of the Chicago C. W. B. M. Union for the past two years. She presided with her usual ease and thoughtfulness. Mrs. E. L. Linney gave the address of welcome. The C. W. B. M. work in the West was ably treated by Mary Eva Flint, of the North Side. The writer discussed the "Relation of the C. W. B. M. to Higher Education," and Mrs. E. E. Smith closed the exercises of the day with a beautiful talk on "Grateful Hearts." The features of the C. E. rally at the night service were an address by the pastor of the First Church of Chicago, Frank G. Tyrrell, on the "Sword of Jesus," and an Open Parliament, conducted by J. H O. Smith. Mrs. E. W. Darst reported fifteen auxiliaries in the Chicago Union.

"Who would have thought such an uplift and inspiration could have been given to our Chicago churches by an installation service?" This query was put to the Chicago Letter writer after the splendid meeting at the First Christian Church last Sunday afternoon. Bro. Tyrrell is the right man in the right place. This was the unanimous judgment of the many representatives of the various churches at the installation of F. G. Tyrrell as pastor of the First Church. A high order of spiritual thought and a deep religious feeling pervaded the meeting from the first to the last of the excellent program.

Bro. J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis, presided. He made a tender and touching reference to Bro. Devore, who could not be present on account of illness. In regard to the installation service he said: "We are here simply to give our 'God bless you' to the formal union of pastor and people. This gathering expresses the co-operation of the Christian forces in Chicago. The close relation between pastor nnd people deserves recognition. The union is the work of the Holy Spirit. 'The Holy Spirit hath made you bishop.' The old idea of 'hiring a preacher' is not scriptural. The preacher gives his time, talent, life, love—his all; and the congregation looks after his material support and co-operate under his leadership, as every congregation of Christians needs leadership."

The mutual relations and obligations of pastor and people were admirably set forth by J. H. O. Smith, of the Union Christian Church, and Dr. H. L. Willett, of the University of Chicago. Bro. Smith considered the pastor's service and success in the past a guarantee of his consecrated leadership in the future. He delicately showed how Bro. Tyrrell combined the three elements of pastor, preacher and organizer. Dr. Willett emphasized the three things a preacher must do: 1. Study; 2. Enter sympathetically into the life of each of his members; 3. His motive for study and visiting must be love.

The night has a thousand eyes,
And the day but one;
But the light of the great world dies
With the dying sun.

The mind has a thousand eyes,
And the heart but one;
But the light of a whole life dies
When love is done.

The blessing of God has rested upon the First Christian Church from the time of the first meeting in Dr. Lindsay's parlor. Since Bro. Tyrrell became pastor the membership has increased from forty-five to seventy-five. Last week an auxiliary to the C. W. B. M. was effected. The charter members are as follows: Mrs. Chas. Jordan, Mrs. E. C. Bowman, Mrs. K. C. Anderson, Mrs. J. C. Lindsay, Miss Mary McCullogh, Mrs. A. A. Devore, Mrs. Duncan, Mrs. R. B. Thrapp, Mrs. Knights, Mrs. G. W. Stone, Mrs. Faddis and Mrs. E. C. Gray. These are all cultured Christian women, who can appreciate the large and important work of the C. W. B. M. I trust each of them will take the Missionary Tidings as well as the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST,

The Christian business man! My dear fellow-preachers, do you realize what magazines of spiritual power, what an abundance of manly influence for God and truth and righteousness is at your command in the noble business men who quietly listen to your sermons Lord's day after Lord's day? Give these earnest men opportunities of expressing their best thoughts and impressing their Christ-filled lives upon the organized work of the church. Our last preachers' meeting was addressed by one of these business men on the "Layman's View of the Pulpit." Bro. Childs, in a careful and considerate paper, told the Christian preachers of Chicago some wholesome facts. He recommended: 1. Naturalness. Too much familiarity on the one hand and too much dignity on the other are both detrimental to a preacher's influence; 2. Be honest in announcing subjects; 3. Preach Christ and not criticism. The heart-hungry business man does not care to listen to a technical lecture on the authorship of Job. He goes to church to hear the gospel preached and to see men and women saved from sin. The following preachers were present, many of whom commented favorably upon the paper: Brethren Sewell, Glover, VanKirk, Willett, Campbell (our Congregational-Christian), Morrison, G. A. Campbell, West, Dean, Darsie, Smith, Lester (Waukegan), Brelos, Tyrrell, Darst, Infield and J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis. Bro. Garrison, speaking from the standpoint of the business man, advised the preachers to make political problems, social problems, literary problems, everything secondary to the peerless privilege of preaching with authority—the authority of God and divine truth.

A rare opportunity for preachers and Christian workers is offered by the Divinity School of the University of Chicago. During the summer quarter a large number of important courses will be given which have been especially prepared for preachers. George Adam Smith, of Scotland, author of the Historical Geography of the Holy Land, the Book of the Twelve, Isaiah, etc., will give two courses throughout the first term (July 1 to August 15). Prof. Moulton, author of the Modern Reader's Bible, will lecture on "Paradise Lost," as a Harmony of Biblical and Classical Thought. Attractive courses in Old Testament Literature, New Testament Interpretation, Sociology, etc., have been especially arranged for the preachers and Christian workers. The Divinity Halls will accommodate 140. The rooms are nicely furnished and no charge for tuition or use of room is made. There are several minor incidental fees for the use of library, etc., and a fee of $9.50 for a quarter for light and care of room. The Disciples' Divinity House offers courses for which credit is given in the Divinity School, viz., Practical Problems among the Disciples of Christ, The Place of the Disciples of Christ among Religious Forces of To-day, Dr. Willett. First Principles and Sources of Alexander Campbell's Theology, Mr. VanKirk. For further information concerning the work of the summer quarter write Dr. H. L. Willett, University of Chicago.

The sorrowful message has just been received concerning the death of Bro. A. A. Devore. Further mention will be made of this staunch friend of the cause of Christ in Chicago. He was president of our City Mission Board and one of the pillars of the First Church, just organized. Our sympathy and the sympathy of all members of the churches of Christ in Chicago go out to his family, especially to his noble Christian helpmeet, Sister Dovore. Her faith and his Christian character will enable her to say:

"Alone—not alone, for the Master
Sits soothing the weary head,
His blessed design reflected
In the gloom and tangled thread,
And into the shadows and silence
There cometh a joy unknown,
Ere the music of earth grew silent
And I wrought with God alone."

New York Letter.

The movement recently inaugurated to foster religious union by means of a state conference has gone so far as to crystallize into an executive committee representing most of the denominations in New York. Arrangements are being made to hold the proposed conference early in 1900, when it is hoped steps will be taken toward a more thorough federation of the churches. The conference will be somewhat on the lines of the World's Parliament of Religions held at Chicago a few years since. Some months ago a letter stating the purpose to organize was sent out to 800 persons, ministers and others in the state. Nearly 400 replies came back and the percentage of favorable replies by religious persuasions were as follows: Unitarians, Universalists and Jews each, 100; Disciples of Christ, 66; Congregationalists, 39; Presbyterians, 37; Methodists, 29; Baptists, 34; Reformed, 21, and Episcopalians, 15. A comparison of this percentage is an interesting study. For instance, the Episcopalians, who have made so much noise about "Federation of the Churches" because it happened to have been started by them, came in the very weakest of all in this new plan for work along similar lines. Why? This did not originate with the Episcopalians. If it had we would be prepared to see their percentage of favor much larger. How about Dr. Briggs' "banner of church unity" being in the Episcopal Church?

Much interest is felt in the election of Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, pastor of the Fifth Ave. Baptist Church of this city, to the presidency of Brown University. This is the great institution over which Dr. E. Benjamin Andrews presided, and from which he resigned because of criticisms passed by the trustees of certain of his utterances in favor of the free coinage of silver during the last national campaign. President James M. Taylor, of Vassar College, was offered the position some months ago, but declined. Dr. Faunce graduated from Brown in 1880, taught mathematics there in '81 and '82, graduated from Newton Theological Seminary in '84, was pastor at Springfield, Mass., from 1884 to 1889, and since has been pastor of the Fifth Ave. Baptist Church, the wealthiest Baptist congregation in America. The nominating committee in presenting his name to the university corporation characterized Dr. Faunce as an "all-round scholar, familiar with the traditions of Brown, cautious in settling practical questions, a progressive man, conservative in his theory of education, an accomplished speaker, and possessed by a Christian enthusiasm for the welfare of those under his supervision." Dr. Faunce, in regard to his decision on the question of accepting the call, said: "It all depends on where my influence for good will be the greatest." It is generally thought that he will accept the call. Doubtless he would make a superior president for Brown University.

The universal happiness throughout the country occasioned by the finding of the kidnapped Clark baby on Thursday morning, June the 1st in the mountains of Rockland County, is an illustration of Carlyle's sentence, "Pity and need make the whole world akin." It also is forcibly expressive of the nobility of human nature, especially on its sympathetic side. Thousands of strong men read the account of the finding of the baby with moistened eyes and many families cried for joy around the breakfast table the next morning. This deep interest shows also the comparative rarity of kidnapping and incidentally indicates the faithfulness and integrity of nurses, with whom so many parents entrust the most precious of all their possessions. If all men take such a deep and sympathetic interest in the loss by theft of one baby, why do they not show a similar concern in the loss by sin of their own and for many thousands of their neighbors children? Is it not because we really do not realize the awful fact that souls are lost in sin? Should we not cultivate a keener sense of the fact that men are really lost without Christ, that we might be more vigilant in the work of their redemption?

That splendid example of "yellow journalism," the New York World, has these absurd things to say about the Disciples of Christ in a recent issue: "Harmony in the ranks of the Disciples of Christ, who held their annual convention yesterday at No. 190 Bleeker St., the "House of the Lord" Mission, is explicable on the ground that they hold but a single essential article of faith. A tank half filled with water in one corner of the room illustrated the simple creed of immersion for the remission of sins, and one staunch young Disciple, William Flavian, proved his adherence to the faith by jumping in. . . . . William Winchester Hall, a lawyer, of No. 335 Broadway, presided at the convention and said, 'We have no ministers in our church, no directors and no head but Christ. We are bitterly opposed by all denominations, because we are absolutely the only Christians who hold to the very plain biblical injunction as to the washing away of sins.'" The reference here is to a meeting at Bro. E. Ballou's mission, where he has been doing an excellent work of its kind for several years. Bro. Ballou does not teach any such nonsense as this peny-a-liner writes for the World. But just such libelous statements as these quoted are what create the current false impressions concerning the Disciples of Christ. To erase such impressions we must continually labor.

FT. WORTH CONVENTION.

Another Texas state missionary convention is in the past. It was held at Ft. Worth, June 5-8. The First and Third Churches, under the leadership of their pastors, C. McPherson and Homer T. Wilson, entertained us royally. Many of their friends, not of these churches, threw open their homes to the delegates. This scribe with his wife, shared the hospitality of one of these delightful homes—Mr. Shappard; breakfast and lodging were free, and the other meals were furnished by the hotels at a low rate. This latter feature was new, and it was popular.

The attendance was large—about 500—and it was from all parts of the state. This means much when it is remembered that our state is about 800 miles from east to west and from north to south. We had Bro. Shultz from El Paso, the western gateway, and Bro. Weaver from Texarkana, the eastern gateway. We also had Bro. Eubank from Dennison, on the extreme north, and Bro. Haston from Galveston, on the Gulf.

The spirit of the convention was delightful. While there was more discussion then usual, the kindliest feeling was manifest in all the speeches. The best remedy for bitterness is active work in a common cause, when we forget the little things and become absorbed in large ones.

The growth of the work during the year is most gratifying, as the following figures show: Days' work, 1,853; sermons, 1,542; baptisms, 537; additions from other sources, 501; churches organized, 11; Sunday schools orgaized, 8; Endeavor Societies organized, 3; weak church-aided, 22; preachers located, 6; places visited, 90; money raised, $7,000.

This is a splendid report within itself, all things considered; but when I tell you that our pledges during the convention for the work of the coming year are almost $3,500, nearly double those of last year, it becomes superb, and fills our hearts with inspiration and hope.

The C. W. B. M., of course, made a good showing. They always do it. However, I could not get the figures as I wished, but learned that they raised $435 for state work, and sent to the national treasury $1,986. Add to this the $450 raised by the Endeavorers, and we have a grand total of $9,871.

But from beginning to close of the convention one dark cloud refused to lift itself for a moment—the cloud which overshadows Add-Ran University. A few years since this school was moved from Thorp Spring to Waco, and from that day to this it has seemed impossible to save it. And now a debt past due of $30,000, like a millstone, seems determined to strangle it to death. We are trying to hope that it will be saved, but it would be hard to give a reason for this hope.

The next convention goes to Paris, one of the oldest and best towns in the state. This is on the eastern border, which is unfortunate in so large a state. But we will try to create such an enthusiasm during the year, and get such low rates on the railroads, that we will have a large attendance anyhow.

The officers for next year are: President, Judge T. J. Brown; vice-presidents, G. Lyle Smith, R. L. Ragsdale; recording secretaries, E. H. Holmes and E. D. Hammer; corresponding secretary, B. B. Sanders. The old board continues: Judge A. Rainey, G. D. Smith, T. E. Shirley, C. A. Gibson, M. M. Davis.

We had many visitors, among whom I now recall the names of W. T. Moore, Columbia, Mo.; David Walk, Los Angeles, Cal.; Prof. Wiley, Oklahoma Territory, and Chancellor Buxton of Add-Ran University.

The wolf of starvation howls at the doors of thousands of men who are well to do and surrounded by plenty. Ill-health, in the majority of cases, is starvation, pure and simple. It means that body, brain, nerve, bone and sinew are improperly or insufficiently nourished. Improper, insufficient nourishment is starvation.

When a man's head aches it is because the tissues of the brain do not receive sufficient nourishment from the blood, or receive impure and unhealthy nourishment. When a man gets nervous and sleepless, it means that the blood is not properly nourishing the nerves. When his skin breaks out with blotches and pimples and eruptions, it means that the skin is being fed upon the impurities of the blood. Almost every known disease is primarily due to improper nourishment through the blood, which is the life-stream. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is the greatest of all blood-makers and purifiers. It gives edge to the appetite, corrects all disorders of the digestion, makes the assimilation of the life-giving elements of the food perfect, invigorates the liver, promotes secretion and excretion, and vitalizes the whole body. It makes firm, muscular flesh, but does not make corpulent people more corpulent. It cures 98 per cent. of all cases of lingering coughs, bronchial, throat and kindred affections, which, if neglected, lead up to consumption. It is the best of all nerve tonics and restoratives. Kept by all medicine dealers.

"I was taken ill in February, 1892, with headache and pain in my back," writes H. Gaddis, Esq., of 313 South J Street, Tacoma, Wash. "I called in a doctor and he came three times. He said I was bilious but I kept getting worse; I took a cough so that I could not sleep, only by being propped up in bed. My lungs hurt me, and I got so poor that I was just skin and bone. I thought I was going to die. I used two bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and it made me sound and well. It saved my life."

No remedy relieves constipation so quickly and effectively as Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. They never gripe.

"Trust not to appearances," but put your faith in Hood's Sarsaparilla, which never disappoints. It is the best medicine money can buy.

The Mormon-Christian War.

I prepare for the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST an account of a "battle over books" with Mormons that will give an inside view of my methods of attack and theirs of defense. I think I have them "bottled up" like old Cervera's fleet.

NAILING A LIE.

Add thou not unto his words, lest he reprove thee, and thou be found a liar (Prov. 30:6).

It is not often that a writer has a golden opportunity to "nail a lie" fast and at the same time put new wings on the slow feet of truth. I have just such an opportunity, and rest assured I will not be slow to take advantage of it.

Every word of God is pure: he is a shield unto them that put their trust in him (verse 5).

Then follow the sweeping warning and the severe punishment of those who add unto his words.

Mormons generally, and their polemics especially, would do well to give special heed to the "words of Agur," quoted above, in full blaze of the context. The "Book of Mormon," "Doctrine and Covenants," "Pearl of Great Price," "The Inspired Translation of the Holy Scriptures," are all additions to the Word of God as received by the world generally since the advent of Jesus.

THE LIE.

R. B. NEAL, GRAYSON, KY.—Dear Brother: I have just closed a discussion with a Mormon elder. Here is what I want: I made one of my clinching arguments on the "Prophecy of Joe Smith," and trusting you for correctness I referred him to "Voice of Warning," pages 142 and 147, as I found it given in your tract, "Smithianity," on page 11. Have been defied to produce the book. J. W. SPAIN.

Driggs, Ark.

In this war Spain will conquer. There will be a lot of sick elders on hand before this question of veracity is ended.

BROTHER R. B. NEAL, GRAYSON, KY.:—In debate with a Latter-day Saint (Mormon) a short time ago, I quoted from you in the Gospel Advocate of July 28, 1898, in which you quoted from a book called "A Voice of Warning," pages 142 and 147. My opponent flatly denied the quotation and produced a book of this title which did not give the quotation as you gave it. Thus he accused you of misrepresenting and falsifying them.

W. H. HULETT.

Centre, Ark.

I thank Brother Hulett for his promptness in reporting the affair. I regret that he did not secure the name of the publisher, the place where published and the date of publication of the copy of "A Voice of Warning" his opponent engaged him with on this point, at the same time casting "unpurty" reflections upon me and my article.

Then, too, I am on the tiptoe of the tallest curiosity to know how the "quotation" read in that copy of the book. Let our debaters in the future guard such points.

THE QUOTATION.

The following from my article in the Gospel Advocate of July 28, 1898, is the battle-ground:

By the way, in one of the books sent me by President Joseph Smith I find this language:

"More than once, just prior to his death, he (Joseph Smith, Jr., the Prophet) predicted that if Brigham Young should get the lead of the church he would lead it to hell. Scores of the old-time Saints testify to this" ("Voice of Warning," page 142).

"He (Joseph Smith, Jr.,) prophesied of the 'temptations and tribulations' and the apostasy of the twelve (apostles); and of Brigham Young, that if he got the lead of the church he would lead it to hell" ("Voice of Warning," page 147).

That "if" mars the claim of Joseph Smith, Jr., as a prophet. Had he said Brigham Young will get the lead of the church and will lead it to hell, he would have predicted what "came to pass," as to the first clause in the sentence; as to the last cause I am mum.

The context shows that "President Joseph Smith," sometimes called "Joseph the Third," who sent me my copy of the book, is the present "seer and prophet" of Lamonia, Ia. As he is the son of the founder and father of Mormonism, he is certainly good authority as to the "ism."

It was no doubt a Utah or "Brighamite Mormon" who met Hulett in debate. That prediction of his prophet, thrust into his face, placed him in a painful dilemma. The quickest way was to deny "the quotation," taking advantage of his opponent not having a copy of the book that has gone through as many editions, perhaps, as "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

By the way, these "Brighamites" will debate any one else but a "Josephite" at the "dropping of a hat" and "drop the hat themselves" on the slightest provocation.

The Josephites hunt the Brighamites for debate with the same eagerness that hungry hounds hunt a panting deer on a warm day. The Brighamites flee from the Josephites with the same haste and hope that the hare flees from the hound. The Josephites cannot get them to meet them in debate. Why is this thus?

I will furnish a Josephite Mormon on shortest notice to meet in debate every Brighamite Mormon that has the courage of his convictions to consent. Try them, taunt them. Mark my prediction, they will not agree to it. The Josephites are manly, honest men by comparison with the Brighamites. But back to my "quotation" and to MY AUTHORITY.

A copy of a book, entitled "A Voice of Warning," by Parley P. Pratt, printed and published at Lamonia, Ia., in 1880, by the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, on page 142, beginning at the fourth line from the top, these words are found:

More than once, just prior to his death, he predicted that if Brigham Young should get the lead of the church he would lead it to hell. Scores of the old-time Saints testify to this.

On page 147, beginning twenty-one lines from the top of the page, I find the following words:

He prophesied of the "temptations and great tribulation" and apostasy of the twelve; and of Brigham Young, that "if he got the lead of the church he would lead it to hell."

Beyond the shade of a shadow of doubt the pronoun "he" preceding the "predictor" and "prophet" stands for Joseph Smith, Jr., the prophet—the head, heart and hands of all Mormon clans, no matter where located. This prediction is to a Brighamite like hot water is to a thieving hound—makes him scamper away in a hurry to save his hair. I now propose to prove the prophecy, and thus to rub the truth in.

The Negro.

There is only one religious people in these parts who are doing anything visible in behalf of the brother in black.

Pine Bluff's most elegant and most costly school building has written over its front door, "Colored Industrial School." A priest and some sisters of charity devote themselves to the intellectual, physical and spiritual interests of the colored pupils who attend. A small chapel in the corner of the yard, surmounted by a cross, has over its door, "St. Peter's."

A priest, who is more solid with this section because of being a Confederate veteran, is now off on a tour among people who are more Northern, raising funds for this school.

It is true, the negro does not take to the Catholic religion very naturally. An aged colored woman said to my daughter, "I tried the Catholics, but there was too much fasting to suit me. I think the Lord put things here to be eaten, and I got tired of Lent and fast days." Nor do they assent to "'fess" so readily as did Topsy. If the Catholics can afford to labor to bring the negro their way, it seems that any other people might.

There has been one religious excitement among the colored people and only one during the past year, and that is among the Holiness band of these people. This class is building quite a good house of worship, over which they have been talking of writing "Holy Ghost Church." I told the pastor not to do it. I said the Holy Ghost would feel more honored to have the house named for God or Christ. These now have more than a hundred members. Many of them in passing one on the street will say "praise the Lord," or utter some shibboleth that you may know they are "sanctified."

What occurred in Georgia last week, even while the President was visiting the state, goes to tell the story of the negro in the South.

In a local-option town certain negroes of the baser sort determine to sell whiskey, as concealed about their persons, and when caught and punished they retaliate by burning the property of their "persecutors." No sooner are they securely jailed on the charge of arson than a masked mob enters the jail, and about a half-dozen of these whiskey peddlers, and may be house burners, are shot to death. It does seem to me I would have wanted evidence that would surely convict before taking the law in my own hands, and with such evidence I would have let the law take its course. Who shall solve the mob problem? Who shall solve the liquor problem? Whoever disposes wisely of the latter will find the other in the way of solution. All our efforts to evangelize the colored man as he is to-day in the Southern states will be but one great waste so long as Christians tolerate the saloon.

Hiram College Jubilee Endowment.

The new epoch is upon us, viz., the epoch of college endowment. "We must educate or we must perish." This well-known quotation applies, not only to the Disciples, but to every religious people. No people can be permanently strong that do not hold with a firm grip their young people. The young people are, not only the inspiration of the present, but the hope of the future. As a people we must place our institutions in the front rank of colleges, and keep up with the advancing standards. It costs twice as much to run a college to-day as it did twenty years ago, or even ten years ago. The college curricula have almost doubled; in fact, it is safe to say that we are teaching more than twice as many branches to-day as were taught in Hiram twenty years ago, and yet we are compelled to do this. The field of instruction has been broadening so rapidly and the institutions of our country have been making such wonderful upward strides that to keep in sight of the advancing procession we have had to increase our work from year to year. The increase in college endowment among us has in no measure kept pace with the advancing standards. It is harder, far harder, to run our colleges now under the exacting demands than it was to run them on the income we had twenty years ago. If we do not lengthen our cords and strengthen our stakes in this great educational work, we will be driven out of the educational business altogether. Large numbers of our young people are even now going to denominational and state schools; continually increasing numbers are going every year to these schools. If we would hold our young people we must give our colleges greater endowment, and that very speedily. It will be a shame to us if we do not put at least a million dollars into college endowment within the next two years. We cannot ask our young people to patronize our own schools unless we give them as good advantages as are offered elsewhere. We may talk about the personality of our own teachers and boast of the work that we have done. I fully agree with all that has been or can be said along this line. I fully believe that we have the grandest body of teachers that any religious people ever had; and yet, with all this we must offer the necessary material equipment or these teachers will be put at a terrible disadvantage. Furthermore, to maintain our schools on their present endowment is simply an impossibility. It is either more endowment or the ultimate collapse of several of our institutions.

THE HIRAM EFFORT.

Hiram is making a tremendous effort to enlarge her endowment sufficiently to give her assurance of perpetuity and increased usefulness. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is a small amount to ask for. No institution ever came forward to ask for help with better claims to public favor. In wise financial management, in rigid economy, in strength and volume of work done, in valuable services rendered to the cause of Christian education and to the Christian brotherhood in particular, no institution excels it. It says to its patrons and to the friends of Christian education, Examine the record, look at the work done, and decide whether or not you can make a better benevolent investment. We believe that all who will take pains to do this will be convinced that they cannot put money anywhere that will tell more for the cause we love than into the work at Hiram College. Send your name; let us speedily have fifty thousand volunteers who will see this institution placed on a solid financial basis by ths time it reaches its Jubilee Commencement in June, 1900.

Are We Following in the "Old Paths?"

The discussions and some of the writings as published in our papers during the past few months have caused me to ask myself the question, Are we to understand that "following in the old paths" means simply being sound in doctrine? My understanding of the purpose of doctrine that it is is a means to the accomplishing of certain ends. I may be sound on the doctrine of faith, repentance and baptism, but unless these shall lead me to "walk in a new life in Christ Jesus" I am not abiding in the "old paths," which are always new to the beginner. It is not the purpose of the writer to point out "heresy," for we have many who are guarding the fortress against all intrusions. It is my judgment that some of the very best brethren among us, who have been guarding, and who stand ready to repulse any attack made upon the doctrine of the church, as understood by them, have made what is termed by them "heresy" and "infidel teaching" far more conspicuous by their over criticism than otherwise would have been possible. To be over suspicious and unduly cautious is always a sign of weakness. Agitation always precedes rebellion. A continuous stirring of the fire tends to increase the flame. Perhaps none were evermore loudly denounced, and that by their own brethren, than were the movers in the "Restoration Movement," and yet it continued to move. The principal motive that prompted this movement was to secure a condition in the church that all might abide in "one mind and one Spirit." Where this Spirit abides there is liberty. Yet it is not that liberty that will permit one to denounce a brother and characterize his teaching as being that of an "infidel" when the life and character of that brother is characterized by the spirit of Christ, and his life consecrated to the service of this same great Teacher. Are we in the "old path" when we speak evil of a brother? Is there not danger of our religious journals fostering if not creating internal strife, and wasting much space, which means money to their owners, by offering their columns too freely for public criticism? But few people care to consider "higher criticism," and while the "giants" may battle along these lines it is very questionable whether the masses of the people will or can be benefited by having these battles continuously waged before them. There are some things Jesus would not speak to his disciples because they were not able to bear them. Do we not need to use some caution along these lines now? Is there not real danger in being ever watchful and critical? Are we not in reality injuring the progress of the Master's cause? I cite one illustration, viz.:

THE CRITICISM ON PROF. WILLETT'S BIBLE STUDY

has caused thousands of people to look upon this splendid work with a question as to the propriety of using it. Many will doubtless refuse to use it, thinking that it is not quite parallel with the "old paths." Yet no one of all its readers would have been injured by the work, even if they had never discovered the error, if error it be, as pointed out by the critic, while no one could study the work without being greatly profited.

The institution of the Bethany C. E. Reading Course was certainly timely. Certain ones were selected to prepare the course of reading and study. Are we walking in the "old paths" while we destroy by our walk the arduous labor of these men? The young people are seeking wheat, not chaff. Suppose we spend more time in sifting out the wheat and giving it to the starving multitudes, and less time stirring the chaff. D. A. WICKIZER, Supt. Bible-school and C. E. Work in Iowa.

Jubilee Notes.

The committee of arrangements for the Jubilee Convention is as follows: A. M. Harvuot, chairman; Geo. A. Miller, secretary; H. J. Seaman, chairman enrollment; J. L. Shuff, chairman finance; Lottie S. Nichol, chairman reception; John S. Lawrence, chairman hotel; J. A. Lord, chairman pulpit supply; P. Y. Pendleton, chairman advertising; P. H. Duncan, chairman Sunday-school; T. M. Worcester, chairman ushers; Justin N. Green, chairman assignment; S. M. Cooper, chairman buildings; R. T. Mathews, chairman press; J. H. Fillmore, chairman music; Mrs. E. P. Tingley, chairman badge; A. W. Taylor, chairman C. E.

The first "Bulletin" was presented to the committee at their monthly meeting at Central, Monday night, and is now in the printer's hands. These Bulletins, bearing such information as we can give now, will be printed in large numbers and sent out through the correspondence of the various missionary societies. Let state and district secretaries, or chairmen of delegations, or pastors—yes, any one who will distribute these—send at once, stating how many they desire. They will cost nothing save the trouble of sending for them.

Bro. W. L. Fisher, of the class of '99, Bethany College, has been chosen assistant pastor of the Central Christian Church for the summer, and will be here July 1st. This will give the chairman a better chance to answer calls made upon him for jubilee speeches and to oversee the committee work at home.

Bro. L. C. McPherson will take charge of the work in New York state, and we trust every pastor will co-operate with him and bring a large delegation from New York.

Bro. and Sister A. B. Philputt were here one day last week looking up hotel headquarters for the Indiana delegation. Why not the heads of other large delegations either visit the city to this end or write John S. Lawrence, chairman hotel committee, and secure headquarters at once? E. B. Bagby writes from Washington, D. C., "We hope to have at least a train load of delegates from the East." A. M. HARVUOT.

Indianapolis Letter.

The Grand Hotel has been secured as headquarters for the Indiana delegates to the Jubilee Convention at Cincinnati next October. This is the largest and most modern hotel in the city and is strictly first-class. The spacious halls and parlors will be at our disposal. They make us a rate of $2.50 per day. The rooms to be assigned at this rate will have a double bed in them and two persons will be expected to occupy one bed. Arrangements can also be made for parties of four or six, either ladies or gentlemen, to occupy larger rooms with two or more beds in them. Of course, there are rooms in the hotel not to be had at this price, but those that are offered will be comfortable and will be entirely satisfactory.

The dining room of this hotel seats over 300. Many prominent brethren from other states will probably stop here. Some have already engaged rooms.

Now any Indiana people wishing to stop at the Grand for all or part of the time during the convention would better drop me a postal card so that arrangements can be made for them.

The rally of the Disciples at the International C. E. Convention at Detroit has been placed in charge of the writer. The program will include fifteen-minute addresses from brethren John E. Pounds, national superintendent, J. Z. Tyler, superintendent of Bethany Reading Courses, and Herbert L. Willett, who has just returned from a year's residence in Germany.

Bro. F. D. Power will conduct an open parliament on "The Present Status of Christian Endeavor Among Us—Its Tendencies and possibilities." This discussion will be participated in first of all by our state C. E. superintendents who may be present, and then by leading workers. Following the parliament will be thirty minutes of impromptu speeches. The sessions will last not more than two hours. It will be held in "Tent Endeavor," where 5,000 people can see and hear comfortably.

The denominational rallies are to be a special feature of the convention this year and their programs will be printed in the general program. If you go to Detroit, you won't miss the rally, of course.

Bethany Assembly.

Dear brethren, everywhere, are you making your arrangements to attend the great Bethany Assembly meetings, to be held on the romantic and beautiful grounds of Bethany Park, beginning on Tuesday, July 18, and closing Monday, August 7? If you are, you will find it one of the most enjoyable and profitable outings that you can possibly take during the summer of 1899. If not, you will probably regret it all the remainder of your life.

The Assembly this year presents attractions that you cannot afford to miss—rest, innocent recreation, intellectual feasts, spiritual enjoyment, everything that makes an outing desirable, are among the reasons why you cannot well afford to remain away from the Assembly this year.

All the conventions of the church will be held during the sessions of the Assembly. Who does not want to participate in the business that has to do with the interest of the Redeemer's kingdom? Here you have an opportunity to attend these conventions without additional cost, while taking your summer outing. Do not fail to attend them.

Are you interested in temperance work—and who is not?—you should be at the Assembly on Temperance Day. The exercises will be nonpartisan—a genuine gospel temperance day. Let us come together that day and plan to do our part to wipe out the saloon, the curse and the crime of the 19th century.

Are you anxious that your Endeavor Society should take home the $55.00 gold medal given by Dr. J. W. Younge, of Ft. Wayne? See to it that your society has a larger attendance than any other and you will capture it. And in addition you will be permitted to enjoy the best Endeavor convention ever held in the state.

The preacher, in or out of Indiana, who does not hear Bro. J. W. McGarvey's lectures to preachers will miss a rare treat and a splendid opportunity to receive instruction needed to help him in his work as a preacher of the old gospel.

If you cannot make a tour through the Holy Land, you can go to Bethany Assembly and hear the talks of Bro. A. B. Philputt, on "Frauds in Palestine." These talks will be confined to his own observations of places of historic interest in the life of Christ.

While at Bethany you will have an opportunity of hearing our returned missionary, Bro. G. L. Wharton, of Hurda, India, tell you about the wants of India. Other returned missionaries will be present and deliver addresses.

We know that you are all interested in Ministerial Relief. So we are glad to invite you to listen to the address of Bro. A. L. Orcutt, who will tell you what has been done, and the great need of enlisting the entire brotherhood in a work so tender, so loving and so divine.

The music will be a special feature of the Assembly. Bro. Hackleman will be assisted by Miss Pearl Perrin, and several well-known singers will have charge of the music.

Miss Ione Riddell, of Cincinnati, O., and Miss Evalyn Jeffries, of Irvington, Ind., will preside at the two pianos.

Inasmuch as the Central Traffic Association has kindly consented to take you to Bethany and home again for one-half fare, you ought by all means to take advantage of these cheap rates, and go to Bethany and enjoy its sessions.

You will soon have the full program. Read it, and then hand it to your neighbor, and then form large parties to go to Bethany and enjoy yourself as never before.

Children's Day offering of the First Christian Church, Kansas City, E. T. Davis, pastor, was $33.60.

The brethren of Manitoba are to have a convention at Portage la Prairie June 15-19. For particulars or other information address John Monro, Box 354, as above.

The convention of the sixth missionary district of Illinois will be held at Shelbyville June 20-22. Entertainment free. Send your name to W. M. Groves, Shelbyville. A good program has been published. A good convention is expected.

All pastors having members who have moved to New Orleans, or who contemplate moving to that city, pro tem. or otherwise are requested to send their names to the pastor of the First Christian Church of that city, M. Pittman, 1451 Magazine St., New Orleans, La.

Carolina Christian College, at Ayden, N. C., has just closed a prosperous session. Arrangements are being made to greatly increase the efficiency of the school for the coming session. New teachers of ability and experience will be added. Each teacher will have the charge of a special line of work.

The convention of the fourth missionary district of Illinois will be held at Watseka June 27-29. A good program has been arranged for this convention. The music of the convention will be led by S. M. Swinford. The church at Watseka extends a cordial invitation to all and will entertain all who attend free.

Wish an energetic young preacher to locate here and take charge of church. Wages not over $35 per month. One who understands photography, especially retouching, could find employment part of the time during the week. Would take a good artist as partner in order to have him locate here and do the church work. Please help us to get in correspondence with one. Very truly,

Miss C. C. Lamb, of the Ladies' Aid Society of the Christian Church at Olin, Iowa, informs us that the following second-hand books will be sent to organizations in need of the same and unable to purchase new ones: Three dozen copies "Hymn and Tune Book" (three kinds, one dozen each), seven copies "The Joy Bells" for Sunday-schsol, two Christmas Concert Exercises, 10 and 12 copies; one Bible Exercise, 35 copies; two Concert Exercises, 12 and 29 copies; "Christmas Glory," 13 copies.

A letter from R. A. Burris, Port Arthur, Ont., announces the arrival of a number of families from various states to join the colony on Rainy River. "Geo. W. Fullerton, who came from Pictu, N. S., with his family, to Rat Portage, has taken upon himself the establishment of the church in this thriving town of 7,000 population. Bro. Hester secured the old Presbyterian Church, rented, and a series of meetings closed with about twenty added to the church. Mission work in several other points will begin as soon as possible."

Dear Christian - Evangelist:—Children's Day offering here, June 4th, was $22.92; apportionment, $15. Eighteen of the scholars gave one dollar each. This is the best offering ever made by this little school. Prospects are bright for the future of our work here. M. P. Givens, of St. Paul, has recently located here. He is a great help to our work. He is in the real estate business. Brethren wanting a good home would do well to write him. David Husband.

New York State Notes.

Our missionary year is rapidly drawing to a close. The annual state convention will be held at Tully, Sept. 20-22. It is not too early to plan to attend.

The work undertaken by the state missionary society has been uniformly successful. Under the society's direction and by its support good work has been done at Watertown, Gloressville, Rochester (Second Church) and Elmira. The interests of the work seeming to demand the separate organization of the two missions at Elmira, this was effected. Bro. Crawford remains with the South Side Church and Bro. Morrison has accepted the call to the West Side.

At the earnest solicitation of the aggressive church at Troy a new work was undertaken and a church planted at Lansingburg, a suburb of Troy. We had hoped to enter Albany, the time seemed propitious, but an increasing deficit has obliged us to halt. It will be seen that the demands on the treasury have been heavy; in fact, far beyond the receipts.

We say, knowing the facts, that the money expended has brought large returns. We challenge comparison with any other field. With limited resources an evangelist has been maintained in the field. The work has been carried on in five churches and a new church established. Quietly but persistently the work has been pushed forward.

Brethren, this cause appeals to us for more liberal support. The possibilities of the field are limitless; open doors await our entrance. It is our own work. If we fail to do it, it will be left undone. Shall we not rally to loyal support? Let the answer be in figures rather than phrases. We need money for the King's business. We appeal in his name to every Disciple in New York state. Will you not assist liberally your own state work? All offerings should be sent to the corresponding secretary, B. Q. Denham, North Tonawanda.

Signs of Summer.

To the observant mind the approach of the different seasons is as plainly indicated by the daily newspaper as by the face of Nature itself. Taking up your morning paper, the now familiar admonition, "Keep cool, drink Hires' Rootbeer," suggests to you as plainly as do the balmy breezes and blossoming trees, the advent of the summer season. You unconsciously associate this popular beverage with hot weather, and would almost as soon expect some breach of conduct on the part of old Nature herself as to miss the familiar name of this sparkling drink which is known and used by all classes throughout the land.

SOME of the worst diseases scarcely give a sign until they strike their victim down. The terrible Bright's Disease may be growing for years and only show now and then by a backache or change of urine, by sallow face and failing appetite.

Dr. J. H. Mc Lean's Liver & Kidney Balm

is a tried remedy that grapples with this disease in every symptom. Cures this and all other disorders of the Liver, Kidneys or Bladder. Sold by druggists, $1.00 a bottle.

Good News from Brooklyn.

Some years ago, when the Talmage Tabernacle was burned, a number of members of that congregation began to attend the First Church of Christ, worshiping on Sterling Place, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Recognizing the moral worth of those people left without a religious home by the fire, the official board of the church, through courtesy, passed a resolution extending to them a cordial welcome to worship with the First Church of Christ, but expressly stating in the resolution that no unimmersed person would be received into full fellowship nor have the right to vote for officers of the church.

The facts indicate that the resolution was misunderstood and misapplied. The results were discord within and disrepute without.

For the sake of harmony the pastor wisely resigned and his labors closed April 1st, 1899.

On May 17 the official board, not as legislating for the church, but as an assurance to the brethren of loyalty to the law of God, passed the following:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the official board that none but immersed believers shall be admitted to membership in the First Church of Christ (Disciples) of Brooklyn, N. Y."

The disaffected members accept the resolution of the board in good faith and are returning to their places and church duties.

I confidently believe that the Sterling Place Church is in the channel that will lead to the open sea of peace and future prosperity.

The key of success will be the selection of a strong, loyal and sympathetic pastor, able and worthy to represent us in this great center of influence. I have been with the church for five weeks and have studied conditions and are confident that the Brooklyn pulpit can be made in a few years equal to any we have in influence for good.

We have a meeting this week for the purpose of selecting a preacher. Doubtless some good church will be asked to give up its successful pastor and some good preacher will be asked to make a present sacrifice.

The reported firm and loyal stand of Bro. J. M. Philputt and 119th St. Church in New York City has also cheered the hearts of the brethren.

The time has come for us to begin to do in Greater New York what we are doing in Chicago. With four loyal churches co-operating, our three well-located missions will soon become churches and New York City will begin to hear about the Disciples of Christ.

J. M. Morris, State Evangelist.

The commencement number of the Orphan School Record is a fine number, and ought to give great satisfaction to the patrons and friends of the Orphan School at Fulton, Mo.

C. W. B. M. at Illinois Encampment.

The Encampment this year is to be the last week in July. The C. W. B. M. part is at the beginning. The informal reception, so enjoyed by all who have attended them hitherto, will be held Monday evening, July 24, at Lida's Wood, as usual. Tuesday, the 25th, will be our day. An excellent program is about completed.

There will be reports of work done and funds raised during the present year for the spread of the Master's kingdom, and plans devised for more and better work in his service for the coming year. There will be addresses, discussions, communings—all good things all day long for all who can come, but especially for our C. W. B. M. women. We hope for a large attendance. The evening address is to be by Mrs. Helen E. Moses, of Indianapolis.

Come, sisters. Come early. Be here Monday evening. Come with hearts warm with love for the loving Christ, and loyal to his service. Come resolute to make this the largest and best gathering in our history. Just twenty-five years ago we organized for state work, a very feeble band, only fourscore strong in dollars and probably less than that in members. Come and see and hear to what we have grown by the grace of God. Come resolved to start afresh on this new twenty-five years, to pray and work and give in Christlike spirit as never before. Come, and again I say COME. ELMIRA J. DICKINSON.

State Mission Notes.

At the state board meeting, the first Friday, the reports from the field were of a very gratifying character. The men are doing splendid work. They are sparing no pains whatever. They are hesitating at no sacrifice that will result in the extension of the kingdom of God. There is not a laggard in the lot. Earnest, true and conscientious men of God, they are worthy of the support of all their brethren.

Yet there were many appeals for help, good honest appeals from places the ripeness of which makes their demands upon us the more imperative. Yet an empty treasury compels your board to turn these appeals down one and all. Not a single added burden could be assumed, yet a failure to take up these appeals means a loss from which it will take years to recover. Whose will be the fault if these waste places are not made glad?

Three weeks ago I sent out 700 letters to as many churches in the state, who had not contributed for state missions this year. In each of these letters I enclosed a postal card, self-addressed, with only a word or two needed to fill it out and bring the message of good will, or bad, to the secretary. The meagreness of the answers so far astonishes me. I have heard from about 25 in all. I thank God for those who have responded, and I trust that many others will answer soon. Remember, the list is to be published in the July Magazine, and it will tell whether you have an interest in this work or not. If you can't contribute will you not say so? I have had but one which said flatfooted they would not. The card would be amusing if it was not so pitiful. God have mercy on the little, narrow, contracted, bigot who could write such a card to his brethren in Christ Jesus. If that be ancient Christianity, I am set on embracing a kind more modern. But it is not. It is a parody, a burlesque on the religion of the Son of God, and one, too, which is doing more injury to the church than the most ultra skepticism.

Brethren, let us hear from you at once. Remember we have inscribed on our banners "Missouri for Jesus." This is our ambition. State Missions must now come to the front. The foreign land has been remembered, the general missions have been called for, now there ought to be such attention given to State Missions that we can answer these appeals at once.

The last needed dollar has been subscribed to the fund for the support of the brothers in Southwest Missouri. He is doing a splendid work. He is now in Chadwick and I am sure that when he leaves there it will be a victory for God and Christ that will make us rojoice. Pray for him that his heart may be strong for the truth, and don't forget our other toilers in the field. They need your sympathy, support and prayers. I believe that if we would pray more for the success of missions we would be more ready to pay for their success as well. If you don't want to pay for missions don't pray for them. Yours in His Name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

No one will rejoice more with the Sheldon brethren in the burning of their mortgage that our board, for the indebtedness has been very hard on all departments of church work, especially the Bible-school, and yet in the face of what seemed an insurmountable burden, the school has nearly always given something to our work, and now will do their full part heartily and happily, and will grow in grace, a hard thing to do with such a strain upon them.

At Liberal the struggling little band is going through a similar experience in trying to build house of worship and work, and when success is theirs, as will be the case, they will shine as a bright light in a dark region. When our work was presented to them by Sister Scott, our most efficient Barton county superintendent, the friends responded even beyond their ability and spoke very hopeful of their outlook. Must be women in charge at Liberal, guess.

The brethren at and near Milo have tired of the constant opposition to all efforts to worship and work for God, and so ask that we help them in building a house, and Bro. John Giddens will take the matter up immediately, and that means another house in which to glorify God and redeem the world.

A DeSoto S. J. Copher is doing a work that gladdens all of us interested in a most important field, and the Bible-school feels the impulse of such a worker sooner than any other department of the church, while there are additions nearly every Lord's day. In this work Bro. Copher shows his faith by his work, as in all the missions of the church, and under his inspiration the school did more than we asked of them.

As you would know to be the case, Beulah has taken new life since H. A. Northcutt's meeting there, and seeks now, under the leadership of W. D. Cree, to be one of the most efficient schools of this city. In the past Beulah has been one of our faithful allies and will soon, I trust, again come into co-operation with us.

The brethren in the country do not appreciate the struggles under which our work in the city and suburbs succeeds, another example of which is seen in Tuxedo, where Luther Moore and the Payne brethren are working hard for the good of men. Yet they give us this year $8.30 for our work. God bless them in it.

Sugar Creek, Buchanan and DeKalb are points where the brethren are friends indeed, as would be expected where J. P. Jesse and R. H. Fife are at work, and where F. M. Eastborn, Eld. Gray, George Allison, J. E. Horn and such men of God work. At Sugar Creek the brethren did so well for our work, while at DeKalb John P. gave me a full house and just double for our work. All will rejoice that R. H. will soon be himself again and will likely be with us at Plattsburg.

Children's Day Returns: Glorious News!

Comparing the receipts for Foreign Missions for the first seven days of June with the corresponding seven days, 1898, shows the following very encouraging returns:

	1898.	1899.	Gain
No. Churches contributing	16	25	9
" S. S. "	104	292	188
" C. E. S. contributing	7	2	Loss 5
" Individuals "	8	20	12
Amount	$1,395.32	$5,133.73	$3,738.41

The total receipts to date amount to $87,280.75 or a gain over the corresponding time last year of $13,636,60.

Please send the Children's Day offering at once. It now looks like $50,000 from the churches, $40,000 from the Sunday-schools, and total receipts for the year, $150,000. F. M. RAINS, Treas.

Braddock, June 6.—Six received recently by letter. The meeting at Turtle Creek conducted by Earle Wilfley is full of promise. Sixteen of members in town, nearly all have signified determination to stand by the work. Bro. Wilfley has won his way to the hearts of the people.—O. H. PHILIPS.

WYOMING.

New Castle, June 6.—G. W. Hall, of Canton, Mo., has been conducting a meeting of three weeks with eight additions; five by baptism at Cambria, a Missouri point seven miles away. After a few night services three made the good confession and were the first ever immersed in this place of 1,500 people.—A. SANDERS.

MONTANA.

Butte, May 29.—Began work here May 21, coming here from Washington, Ind. Large congregations have attended every service. Twelve accessions at regular services yesterday, May 28; 10 by letter (some long withheld). One from Congregationalists, one by obedience. The prospects are bright for the gospel at Butte.—E. O. TILBURN.

CALIFORNIA.

Oroville.—At Gridley a few weeks ago four additions; at Maxwell one baptism, a man about 60 years of age. I began work here as pastor last Lord's day.—C. E. EDGMAN.

Maryville, June 1.—Closed protracted meeting at Gridley last Saturday evening with 16 accessions. I filled my pulpit here in Maryville last Lord's day. A young lady made the confession at the morning service and was baptized Tuesday.—L. B. COGGINS.

IOWA.

Council Bluffs, June 1.—Four additions recently.—S. M. PERKINS.

Mason City, June 5.—After a sermon in the morning to the children five of them gave their hearts to God and a traveling salesman did likewise. A fair offering was received in the Bible-school. At the night service an excellent woman confessed Christ, making seven for the day. Of the 500 or more persons baptized here in the past three years, 140 have been boys and girls of 15 or under.—SUMNER T. MARTIN.

COLORADO.

Denver, June 3.—Our meeting at the Highland Church will close to-morrow. We have had splendid attendance and hope for a great day to-morrow. I go to Maysville, Mo., as soon as we close here. My permanent address is Maysville, Mo.—C. E. MILLARD, singing evangelist.

Denver, June 5.—Meeting at the Highland Church was pre-eminently a time of seed-sowing. C. E. Millard led our singing. We commend him and his work to the churches. By means of his illustrated solos a wide hearing was given our message and the church rejoices in 37 additions.—GRANT K. LEWIS.

TENNESSEE.

Chattanooga, June 8.—Last December I organized a mission at East Lake, a beautiful suburb of Chattanooga. Bro. A. I Myhr came the 1st of May, and assisted me in the work fourteen days. I have continued the meeting to date, with 23 baptisms and a number added by statement. Some from Baptist, We now have about 40 members there. The next step will be ta buy a lot and build a house of worship.—W. W. TAYLOR.

Johnson City, June 9.—Two additions at this place since last report by baptism. G. W. Thompson closed his work at this place last Lord's day.—A. B. CROUCH.

INDIANA.

Ft. Wayne, June 8.—A husband and wife were baptized on prayer-meeting night. Work hard and slow, yet the Lord be praised.—Z. A. HARRIS, minister of West Creighton Ave. Church of Christ.

Zionsville, June 5.—Two additions at Clarksville yesterday. Raised about $8 for missions at Dover.—WM. H. KNOTTS.

Ladoga, June 7.—R. Graham Frank, of Nicholasville, Ky., has been assisting me in a meeting at Jamestown, Ind. Meeting lasted two weeks; 16 confessions. Splendid interest was manifested and the house was crowded last night. Bro. Frank is a splendid preacher, and made a fine impression on the community. —W. T. BROOKS.

FLORIDA.

Jacksonville, June 7.—The Martin meeting with the First Church has closed. There were 178 additions; 149 by confession and baptism. Of the 28 who came in by letter or statement 12 had been members of the Christian Church elsewhere. There were 15 additions the last day. Another ten days or two weeks would have added many more. There are many reasons for its success. The great tabernacle built on Main St., the standing ad. with Bro. Martin's picture in the Metropolis, the daily report of the sermons in the Metropolis (Bro. Rufus A. Russell is managing editor), the devotion and enthusiasm of the members of the First Church (grand, good people), combined to give opportunity. Add to this the power of S. M. Martin and you have the secret. The addition to the church necessitates an addition to the building which we begin at once. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is awake—sent sample copies to be distributed. "They have their reward."—J. T. BOONE.

MISSOURI.

Nashville, June 6.—Two baptisms during the last month. One at Greenwood and one at Nashville.—A. W. JONES.

Kansas City, June 5.—Three added to Westport Christian Church yesterday.—THOS. J. DICKSON.

Marceline, June 5.—Two confessions last night at regular services; two from Presbyterians in May since last report.—ISOM ROBERTS.

Chamois, June 6.—H. A. Northcutt closed last Sunday night a three weeks' meeting at Chamois. It was a splendid meeting from the beginning. The brethren had only hoped for a two weeks' meeting and had the money to pay for it in the bank when Bro. N. began, but they continued it a little over three weeks. I was sorry that I could not be with them only eight or ten days. Bro. Northcutt's sweet spirit and kind presentation of the gospel at once captivated the people and his touching appeals were simply irresistable. As one good sister said, "If we had searched the world over we could not have found a man that would have suited the place and people better." There were 40 added to last Thursday; I have not heard the full number at the close. We feel Bro. Northcutt has done us great good and we hope to have him with us again. —J. H. CRUTCHER, pastor.

ILLINOIS.

Payson.—Two baptized at our prayer-meeting Wednesday night.—CALEB EDWARDS.

Camp Point, June 5.—One baptism at Winchester yesterday. Children's Day apportionment of $40 raised.—R. A. OMER.

Longview, June 7.—Four additions to the Prairie Chapel congregation Saturday night and Lord's day. Our Children's Day exercises Sunday evening was a grand success.—B. N. ANDERSON, pastor.

Mattoon, June 7.—Two months ago to-day Arthur A. Wilson came here as our pastor in response to a call for five years. Since he came 16 have been added at our regular meetings, over $500 raised and audiences increased, so that all our room is full at the evening service. We expect, under his leadership, to wipe out $2,500 of our indebtedness before Oct. 10.—O. CLARENCE SCOTT, clerk.

Sangamon, June 5.—One week ago yesterday we began a tent meeting at this place. Five accessions; four confessions, to date. Evangelist J. G. M. Luttenberger is a strong preacher and gives them straight gospel truths. —GUY B. WILLIAMSON, singer.

West Salem, June 5.—We have just finished a fine meeting at the Marion Church, with 50 additions; 46 by baptism, two from the U. B.'s that had already been immersed and two from other congregations of our own. Their ages are from 15 to 70.—G. W. TATE.

A Memory.

MARY PENDELTON KEMPER.

Looking over some old papers recently, I found carefully secured as being of value, a small time-stained package inscribed, "The hair of my dear Sally, died March 19, 1844, aged 21."

Only a lock of her hair,
All that is left of her now,
Never a trace of her beautiful face,
Never a smile of the lips that could wile
Joy to the mournfullest brow.

Only a look of her hair,
Memory goes backward to-night
And I see her again, freed from suffering and pain
As with slow failing breath, she lay waiting for death,
But a faith that was steadfast and bright.

Only a lock of her hair,
Surely, her lot was the best.
Why mourn for a life that from sorrow and strife,
From foes that assail and from woes that prevail
Is safe and forever at rest?

"The Ideal and Practical Organization of a Home."

[From an exceedingly stimulating and suggestive article on the above topic in the June number of the Cosmopolitan we reproduce the following interesting paragraphs. The article as it appeared in the Cosmopolitan was compiled from the suggestions of fifty young women, by a committee, and is well worthy of a full reading in every home.—EDITOR.]

"In the home of a family whose annual income does not exceed two thousand or two thousand five hundred dollars, only a a part of the labor can be done outside of the house; indeed, the greater part of it must come directly under the eye of the mother, if not be done by her hands. Since the amount of money to be spent decides so largely what can be bought and how much labor can be hired, the question of expenditure should be one of the first to be settled in organizing a home.

"The head of the household must decide to pay a certain part of the income for food, so much for clothing, a certain sum for rent if he does not own a home in which to live, another for fuel and light, so much for church and charity, a part for taxes and insurance, a part for books and magazines, which we will call the library fund, a certain amount for traveling and amusements, and not least among the items will be the amount that should be saved during the year, to put on the bank account. Variations from such an apportionment as this may be made, as necessity or taste dictates, but the preparation of such a standard will do very much toward helping a family to live within its income, and lay aside something for the rainy day, or buy a little home of its own. Indeed, with the prospect of some day buying a home of their own, many a little sum would be put aside by the members of the family out of the money apportioned to amusements, or be saved by careful economy in clothing and so forth.

"The department of domestic economy is by no means an unimportant or insignificant one in a household. It is one also in which every member of the family can take a part. Think of the food wasted and thrown away because too much was bought or cooked or too many kinds were prepared at one time, of the unnecessary waste in wearing out the clothing and furnishings of the house, the gas carelessly left burning when not in use, the fuel consumed which does not birng its return of heat when needed. Each of these items affects the expense account, and in correcting them each member of the family may take a part and have a certain responsibility, about which a report may be made from time to time.

"A purchasing department is a necessity in every home organization. Its duties are to select and inspect whatever comes into the house of food, clothing, house-furnishings, books or toys. The committee should study to buy the best material the family can afford for the least money. It is never good economy to buy cheap material because it is cheap, or to buy anything that is not needed. The sale and the bargain counter have helped to ruin many a poor man, for one buys much there because it is cheap and then finds that it is useless as well as cheap. On the other hand, it is not necessary to pay the highest price in order to get the best or most suitable material. The food that costs the most is not usually the most nutritious; fruits and vegetables out of season are often not fit to be eaten, and they are very expensive; the meats furnishing the most nutriment are not those for which one pays the most money. Too often the marketing is left to an inexperienced buyer and one ignorant of the real value of the various kinds of food. There are now excellent teachers of the art of cooking and many books on the subject of the food which is best fitted to build and sustain healthy bodies, so that to be ignorant on the subject is willful crime.

"In buying clothing and material to be made into clothing, there is much to be considered. The dress to be worn on the street requires different materials from those of the house dress. The finest and most expensive wash goods does not always look the best after it has been through the laundry, nor does the heavy, coarser material always wear the longest. Some kinds of material which wear very well show dirt much more easily than others.

"Just so with household furnishings; the use to which the article is to be put, the wear it must have, must determine the kind of material to be bought.

"This purchasing committee should make frequent reports (in writing if possible) to the bookkeeper, or account committee. A detailed account which shows how every penny has been spent in each department of the house is absolutely necessary to economical organized housekeeping. These accounts should be open to inspection by the family, and suggestions for improvement from time to time should be received.

"Each child should have an allowance, even though the amount of money be very small, in the manner of spending which he ought not to be too much restricted. His little account need not be open to the inspection of all the members of the home, but the experiences of the others will often help him in his own efforts to acquire business methods.

BOSTON. NEW YORK. CHICAGO

"A good way to enccurage the members of a family to take an active interest in the affairs of the home is to allow them to make suggestions about things in the house. Let one tell a point he believes could be improved and how, a way to lessen the expense in some item, a book much desired for the library, and many other things which will suggest themselves as the idea develops itself. There might be a box or a book into which the suggestions could be put until they could be considered at a family meeting.

"Family meetings must be held, at which the interest of the family will be discussed, reports received from their chairmen of the various departments, and decisions made about affairs in which all the members of the family have a vote. These meetings may be held as frequently as desired or when it may be necessary, but additional importance will be given them and a greater interest taken if a regular time and a certain place are given up to them. Some families have these meetings at the dining table once a week at whatever meal the family is most like to eat together, and at one where some time can be given, if necessary, to the questions under discussion. These meetings should be the means of promoting harmony in all the affairs of the family, and the hearty co-operation of all the members in whatever will promote the best interests of the whole. As much of the dissatisfaction in homes is caused by a failure to understand the intentions of other members of the household, and the selfishness found there is often caused by lack of knowledge of and hence interest in the affairs of the whole, the meetings will remove many causes for dissatisfaction and selfishness and promote the reign of peace and love.

"The children are to look to their parents always for good examples in conduct and for training in judgment and the practice of the good principles inculcated. In turn, the parents must themselves be as far as possible what they wish their children to become, and then in love and gentleness and in wisdom help them to reach the ideals they have set.

"In performing the duties about the home the utmost promptness of action should be required, that one department shall not take more than its share of the day. What must be done, if possible, should be done at once. A little leak is soon stopped, a little rent soon mended, but left to themselves they become the avenues of ruin. If a suggestion has been made that is thought to be practical, let it be put into operation at once. It will encourage the one who made the suggestion and may be a very decided improvement in the department it affects. Then, promptness in others. Prompt obedience on the part of the children, prompt assistance where it is needed, prompt and cheerful performance of every duty, will avert many a misfortune and bring many a pleasure.

Where's Mother?

Bursting in from school or play,
This is what the children say:
Trooping, crowding, big and small,
On the threshold, in the hall—
Joining in the constant cry,
Ever as the days go by:
"Where's mother?"

From the weary bed of pain
This same question comes again;
From the boy with sparkling eyes,
Bearing home his earliest prize;
From the bronzed and bearded son,
Perils past and honors won:
"Where's mother?"

Burdened with a lonely task,
One day we may vainly ask
For the comfort of her face,
For the rest of her embrace.
Let us love her while we may,
Well for us that we can say:
"Where's mother?"

Mother with untiring hands,
At the post of duty stands,
Patient, seeking not her own,
Anxious for the good alone
Of the children as they cry,
Ever as the days go by:
"Where's mother?"

A Confederate Mule Story.

A notorious character was Michael Dugan, commonly called "Mike," says John S. Wise, in the May Atlantic. Dugan, indulging a taste for spirituous liquors not uncommon with gentlemen of his nationality and station of life, and impelled thereto by depressed feelings resulting from the inglorious ending of his military career, had not drawn a sober breath for a week. He had, in fact, a horse bucket full of colorless North Carolina corn whisky, from which he regaled himself with a tin cup at all hours of the day and night. Muttering to himself he moved about, sometimes becoming entangled in the tent cords, some times falling headlong into or out of the tent. In an animated discussion with a teamster in like condition with himself, he had been nearly brained by a pair of mule hames whirled like a flail. Mike was a plucky fellow, and fearing his wrath his adversary, Rogers, had fled the camp. For several days Mike had rambled about, muttering to himself: "Oi'll kill Rogers. Bedad, and Oi'll kill him. Oi'll kill him if I have to follow him to Tennessee." We were constantly anticipating that something would happen to Mike. The day before our departure something did happen. A party of us, seated in the tent around a blanket spread upon the ground, were playing draw-poker. Of a sudden a heavy body struck the tent and nearly carried away its fastenings. Rushing out we found Mike lying there, unconscious, and bleeding profusely. A mule, tethered to a tree hard by, stood patiently passive, with head hung low and drooping ears. We never for a moment suspected the mule. Mike looked as if he was done for. We lifted him gently, placed his head upon a McClellan saddle tree, chafed him, plied him with some of his favorite beverages, and, about the time we were despairing of resuscitating him, his eyes opened slowly.

"Byes, am I dead?" asked Mike.

"No, no, indeed, old boy, you're all right," said we; for Mike, in spite of his failings, was a brave soldier, and much beloved.

In a plaintive, tremulous voice he began: "Oh, byes, do-an't let me die. Ye know Oi'm not afeared to die. I was wid Floyd at Fort Donaldson. I was wid Abberton Seedney Johnson at Shiloh, and Pimberton at Vicksburg. I was wid Pat Cleburne at Franklin, and Joe Johnston at Atlanta, and Hood at Nashville. Go ask dem, byes, if Mike was afeared. But save me now, byes! Oh! It is too ha-a-a-a-rd to be kicked to death by a—mule, the day afther the surrinder."

A Last Interview with President Davis.

Mr. Davis asked me to remain. He said that he wished to talk with me further, says John S. Wise, in the May Atlantic. While waiting for him in the hallway, Major Sutherlin, who had known me from childhood, beckoned to me and asked, "Aren't you hungry after your ride?"

I grinned. I was always hungry then.

"Jim," said the Major, "see if you can't get something for the Lieutenant to eat." Jim went out, and in a few minutes returned, bowing, and invited me into a butler's pantry. He apologized for the place, and explained that the house was so crowded he had nowhere else to spread the repast. He had milk and corn coffee and butter and rolls, and cold turkey. I said: "Jim, shut up. You know that I am not used to as good as this." With that I tossed off a glass of milk, swallowed a cup of coffee, and, opening my haversack, tumbled the butter and rolls and turkey legs into it and buttoned it up. Jim stood there, highly amused at the short shrift I made of his feast, and remarked, "You'se a fust-class forager, ain't you, Lieutenant?" "Yes," I said, "you must keep fire in the box, Jim, if you want the engine to run. Now I'm ready for the President."

I slipped back into the hallway and sat down to wait until the President should call me. In a little while his conference broke up and he came to the door. "Now, Lieutenant, I'll see you," and he led the way into the drawingroom; and there we had a long talk, I going more into details. At the close of our conversation he sat for sometime peering into the gloom outside, and finally broke the silence by saying:

"You seem to know the roads. Do you feel equal to another trip?"

"Assuredly," said I. "I now have a relay of horses, and am more than glad to serve in any way I can."

"Very well," said he. "Leave your horse in Major Sutherlin's stable to assure his being well fed, and report for orders to-morrow morning at eight o'clock." I took the mare to the stable. It looked so inviting that I clambered up a ladder to the loft, opened my haversack, enjoyed Major Sutherlin's food, placed some hay under me and drew some hay over me, and had a glorious night's rest.

When I reported the next morning, the President did not ask at what hotel I was stopping. I received my return dispatches, and I started back to General Lee.

Upon the same day that General Lee surrendered at Appomattox, I reached Halifax courthouse on the return trip.

A Visit to the "Upper Room."

C. B. DABNEY.

Have you visited the "upper room" today? Does a pall of present forgetfulness as dense as the blackness of that night shut out the world's intrusions? Are you alone with Jesus and his friends, and ready to breathe the atmosphere of his gentle, majestic and holy converse?

The supreme moment approaches. Even now its shadow advances across the threshold. Upon that moment all truth is pendant. In that which he must then accomplish the universe succeeds or fails. The divine Teacher, who never trifled, must speak in earnest now. In such a time he could not consciously deceive. Nor could he be deceived.

"And now I have told you before it come to pass," said he, "that when it is come to pass, ye might believe." What he said would come, did come. "One of you shall betray me." The hands of sinful men shall bind me; mock trial shall condemn me; the cross shall torture me; the tomb shall receive me; Peter will deny me. All of you shall be offended because of me this night. Yet the grave cannot retain me. I will rise the third day; ye shall see me again, and your sorrow shall be turned into joy, and your joy no man taketh from you. I go to my Father. The Holy Spirit will come. My church will begin its career. You shall preach the gospel among all nations, and the gospel will triumph." He spake the things he knew. He was not deceived.

With solemn earnestness we should now listen. No opinion of our own should neutralize; the teachings of no man, however great, should shade; no prejudice should mar his counsel. His words are final, all-embracing and supreme.

He teaches concerning himself: That by the side of God he stands as the object of religious faith: "Ye believe in God, believe also in me;" that he is the Son of God; "My Father" is spoken repeatedly by him—thirteen times in three chapters—as he accords to no one else to speak it; that he has full authority in "my Father's house;" Jesus is the King of heaven; that he is the only way of approach to God: "No man cometh unto the Father but by me;" that he is the only true revelation of God: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," "I am the truth;" that he is the prayer answerer: "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son;" that through him God is honored; that he is the rightful commander of his people: "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me, and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father;" that he is the source of life to his people: "I am the vine, ye are the branches," "I am the life."

Herein is uttered his own conception of himself. It was sustained in all its defiant strength at just that moment when to human appearance it must certainly fail. No man can bring rebuttal of corresponding weight against his own testimony, because no man has viewed or can examine his claims from an equal vantage ground. He is the Son of God, the divine Son, the only begotten. Outside of covenant relation with Christ there can be no true religious life, and hence no true life of any kind.

Mt. Pulaski, Ill.

The Tornado.

All day the angry clouds had swept
Athwart a saffron sky,
All day the restless winds had wept
To nature's tearless sigh.
'Twas eventide and eager eyes
Still watched the brazen west
With breathless gaze, while aching throbs
Filled every anxious breast.

Then suddenly coming from above
A thing of fearful form,
The rolling chariot of Jove—
The monarch of the storm.
With mighty, thund'ring, deadly roar,
A black and awful frown,
On came the raging, baleful thing
That doomed the happy town.

"Fly for your lives! 'tis coming down!"
Those outside wildly cry,
But roar on roar their voices drown;
Those luckless ones must die.
Those sightless couriers of the air—
The storm king's midnight steeds,
With all his chariots of war
Upon the helpless speeds.

Round and round, in mazes dark,
The whirling monster flew;
From horizon to heaven's vault
The roaring demon grew.
Oh God!—those shrieks of wild despair—
And see—that mangled form
Goes hissing through the angry air;
There's murder in the storm!

With crash and roar the houses fall,
Or soar aloft on high,
To mingle with the blackened smoke
That fills the weeping sky.
A moment—and the monster's gone.
We pause to gain our breath,
While o'er that smoking, ruined path
There broods the hush of death.

The widows sob, the orphans cry,
The groans that fill the air,
The homeless dazed—the tearless eye,
Alone bespeak despair.
All night long the faithful toil
Beneath the ruined heap,
Until each mangled form is found,
And then sit down to weep.

The Railroads and the Public Welfare.

For many years the railroad systems of the country have been going through the financial reorganization as a penalty for the reckless and improper methods of the 60s and 70s. The clear tendency of the times is to knit together yet more closely the whole texture of the country's railroad system. It is not at all impossible—so swift is the movement nowadays of industrial and financial combination—that all the railroad systems of the country might, in the not very far distant fnture, be amalgamated into one great corporate whole. Nor is it to be taken for granted without careful thought and study that such a consummation would be deplorable. The legislative power to regulate railroad rates has become established in practice and is firmly upheld by the decisions of the courts; and the state also possesses the power of taxation. It is not easy to see, therefore, how the community can be in danger of losing its liberties through the further reduction of the railroad network of the country to a complete and unified system under one harmonious control. Nor would it seem to matter very much whether this issue came about through the legalization of pooling contracts or through the actual consolidation of railroad properties. This will seem a hard saying to many readers holding the old anti-monopoly views. The thing to be desired is the elimination from the railroad business of all speculative elements, so that after expenses of operation and maintenance are paid, and the managers and employees receive fair salaries and wages, there should remain just enough profits to pay interest and dividends upon an honest capitalization. This process seems to be working out through natural business laws. When it is pretty well completed it will be soon enough, in the United States, to consider whether or not the state ownership of railroads is desirable; and when that time comes it may perhaps make no very great difference whether the government of the country manages the railroads directly or whether it leaves them to be managed by a private monopoly subject to public control, regulations, and taxation.—American Monhtly Review of Reviews for June.

A Good One on Depew.

One of the best stories told at the recent dinner at Albany given by Senator Tim Sullivan was this:

"Dry Dollar" went into Chauncey M. Depew's office recently, and Senator Depew greeted him.

"Well, Tim, you are looking real prosperous," he said. "You must be having a profitable season at Albany."

"Oh, yes, Senator!" replied Tim. "I can't complain."

"Well, now—tell me, Tim," said Depew, "are these stories true about all this crooked business in the legislature?"

"On the dead level, Senator," was Tim's answer, "now, I'll tell you. The only crooked thing up there this session was your election as United States Senator."—Sunny South.

"Hello, Central!" "What number, please?" "One thousand two hundred and sixty-four." "I don't catch that." "One thousand two hundred and sixty-four." "Try it once more, please." "Twelve hundred and sixty-four." "Seven hundred and sixty-four?" "No; twelve hundred and sixty-four—one thousand two hundred and sixty-four." "I can't give you two numbers at once. Which do you want first?" "I was giving you the same number two different ways." "A little louder, please. I can't quite make you out." "I said I was giving you the same number two different ways." "Oh, yes. Well, what number do you want?" "Twelve hundred and sixty-four." "Suppose you give me each figure separately, like one, two, three, for instance." "All right. One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven, twelve. Got that?" "Yes." "One, two, three, four, five, six. Got that?" "Yes." "One, two, three, four. Got that?" "Yes." "You want twelve, six, four, do you?" "Yes, twelve hundred and sixty-four. Do you understand now?" "Yes, I understand. Twelve sixty-four is busy now. Ring off, please."—Harper's Bazar.

Better than Beer.

It is estimated that those who use three beers a day might in the course of a year have instead of the beer:

1 Barrel of Flour,
50 Pounds of Sugar,
20 Pounds of Corn Starch,
10 Pounds of Macaroni,
10 Quarts of Beans,
4 Twelve-pound Hams,
1 Bushel Sweet Potatoes,
3 Bushels Irish Potatoes,
10 Pounds of Coffee,
10 Pounds of Raisins,
10 Pounds of Rice,
20 Pounds of Crackers,
100 Bars of Soap,
3 Twelve-pound Turkeys,
5 Quarts of Cranberries,
10 Bunches of Celery,
10 Pounds of Prunes,
4 Dozen Oranges,
10 Pounds of Mixed Nuts.

As those given to the beer habit are largely of the poorer classes or of those who can least afford the cost and who are most frequently in need of the necessities of life this should be a strong argument in favor of an immediate exchange or a more temperate life.

CATARRH AND CONSUMPTION

I have spent nearly fifty years in the treatment of the above named diseases, and believe I have effected more genuine cures than any specialist in the history of medicine. "The Wonders of the Sky."

ISAAC E. BARNUM.

"The Wonders of the Sky" is one of the daintiest of little books. On the front cover there is a beautiful picture of a blue field of the skies, set with a coronet and stars of gold. Open the book and there is a portrait of its author, W. J. Russell. Turn a page and there is a tender and loving inscription of the book "to the most faithful and yet most kindly of critics, Helen, my honored and beloved wife."

In some way the moon and stars are always involved in a man's love for a woman. We cannot explain it, but millions of manly hearts respond.

"For the moon never beams without bringing me dreams
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee,
And the stars never rise but I feel the bright eyes
Of my beautiful Annabel Lee."

The introduction is written by J. H. Garrison, and he has well read and expressed God's thoughts after him, regarding the vastness of the universe and the sublime declaration of the heavens. "The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth his handywork," is one of the growing texts of Scripture.

Every time that the great telescope at Mt. Hamilton sweeps across the heavens it adds to the power and meaning of those adoring words of the psalmist. The language of the heavens must depend for its power and results upon the knowledge and understanding of its hearers.

In the book the author has crystallized and expressed in chaste and forcible language the history and facts of the science of astronomy.

The work has been faithfully done and the author has avoided the appearance of straining to express the immense distances and dimensions concerning which he was writing.

Young couples should buy and read the book, but I will not tell why.

Christian S. S. Literature

WHY USE IT? For the same reason that Christian Churches employ Christian preachers. Preachers are instructors, but not more so than the literature placed in the hands of the children. If first impressions are most lasting, would it not be safer to put sectarian preachers in our pulpits than sectarian literature in our Sunday-schools?

Sunday-school instruction should be in harmony with the teaching of the Bible. The literature published by the Christian Publishing Company is sound to the core, and proclaims the Old Jerusalem Gospel in all its simplicity and purity.

CONDUCTED BY

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS, PLATTSBURG, MO.

The Robber's Mother.

Washington Shaw had put off his visit to his mother till Monday, that he might have Mr. Weston's company and help. In the meantime he rented the two-room house by the depot. Mrs. Weston and Mrs. Dancy gave him some old pieces of furniture. Miss Harriet furnished a bedstead which had been set up in her garret for the spiders to sleep upon. Mrs. Blount donated a rusty coal stove with two legs, and Washington put bricks where the other two legs belonged by right. The entire Advance Society went over to see the furnished apartments, under the convoy of Mr. Weston and Fup. Of course, Delight made one of the company. Washington showd with pride where his mother would sleep; he pointed out the rickety table with a beaming face. He showed that the coal stove had a lid on top which could be removed. "A tea-kittle will just fit in that hole," said Wash. "The top of that stove will cook for us, the sides will warm us, the door will throw out light at night and save lamps, the in'ards will furnish ashes to make a path from the back door to the well. In the front room I'll have my counter and sell hard-biled aigs, these kind with the whites as blue as a wintry sky, like you gits in depots; and coffee, yes, I'll git a big tank and bile it over till it's all drank, or biled away."

"But where will you sleep, Wash?" said Delight. Washington stared at her. He had evidently not thought of himself. "Why, under my counter, when I git one. Meantime there's a tree in the back yard that I kin hang myself to."

"Like the jumping jack I saw tied to a Christmas tree, one night?" said Delight. "Oh, you sweet old jumping jack!" With that she spread out her arms and ran toward the beaming owner of all this wealth. Monday morning Mr. Weston and Wash were seated side by side on the passenger-train. As it drew out of the station, Wash looked over at his new abode with keen relish. It was his first place he could call home since he ran away from his mother.

"Wash," said Mr. Weston, "you say your mother belonged to my church? I am afraid she failed in her duty, or they would never have let her go to the poorhouse."

"I can't believe that," said Wash. "The way she used to go to church when I was a kid, a-making me come along and sit on high, hard benches with my legs a-getting corns on their undersides, and my stomach gitting emptier every time the preacher said, 'In the next place, bruthrin;' don't I remember that? I does. But I can't blame the church for dropping Ma, when I dropped her myself."

"True, you can't blame. Well, we will soon learn the truth. But from your way of speaking, I am afraid you didn't like the church."

"It was this way," said Wash. "You see, Pa, he was always drunk, a chronic affliction, it was. So she had to have somebody to go with her. She took me. I was jest a little kid. I didn't know nothing—without it was my feet a-going asleep and gitting crawly up and down first one toe and then another, and a-watching the colored winders and a waitin' for the preacher to git through with his standing up there and a-reading of his sermon. You see, I never understood what he was a-talking about except it was new books what had come out, of I don't know what, and every onct in a while he would refer to the birds and flowers and waves a-washing in a kind of way that seemed it didn't have no real bearing on the main theme. A good deal about Ameriky, too, and the flag—you see it was jest before war times, and he didn't say much about God or Jesus, exceptin' when he prayed, and then, of course, he jest nachully had to come to them. And when I got bigger, I didn't go to church, I couldn't be drove; no sir!"

The train stopped at Hammertown. "I am going at once to our preacher, said Mr. Weston. "You get a carriage from the livery stable, and have it driven around—you in it, of course." Wash followed Mr. Weston till he found where the minister lived, then he hurried away. Mr. Weston was shown into the parlor where he introduced himself to Bro. Tracy. Presently Mr. Weston stated the object of his call, and inquired if Mrs. Shaw was a member of Bro. Tracy's congregation.

"Her letter is in our church," said Bro. Tracy. "Poor woman, she has had a hard time. Her son deserted her many years ago, and she was obliged to earn her living by working out. But a few years ago she became helpless from rheumatism, her hands were drawn so she couldn't do a thing. For awhile the brethren supported her. Then they felt that she was a burden. Yes, she was always faithful to the church. But there was the poorhouse, built for just such people as she. It is a handsome and comfortable building, managed by a very pleasant gentleman. The brethren felt that the county owed Mrs. Shaw a living. They had to contribute to home and foreign missions, etc., and in short, she is out there now. When the weather is good she comes to church—walks, of course, all alone—well, it's only a mile and a half, or a little more. You can see the place from town, oh, yes! A few months ago I suggested in the officer's meeting that we rent a little cabin for her in town, but they objected. In the first place, if we help her, we will have to help others—this is what they said. Then, if we take everybody away from the poor farm, what's the use of us paying taxes to keep it up? Then, the church is not a charity institution. We have to send our money to support missions at home and abroad, and help the poor over in India. Would Mrs. Shaw be happier by herself, living in town? Why doesn't her son return and support her? These and other objections were urged, yes, and with a great deal of warmth, I assure you."

Mr. Weston knew that it was no use to argue with Bro. Tracy, since this matter was one for the church officers to decide. The carriage was outside the door. He joined Washington Shaw, and they were rapidly driven out of town. The poorhouse was in truth an imposing structure of red brick, and presented a handsome appearance among the green fields. They were met at the front door by Mr. Jas. T. Wrenchingfield, the overseer. He was well dressed, and very polite.

"Mrs. Shaw?" he said. "Ah, yes, follow me." But instead of leading the way into the beautiful building, he started across the yard toward a tottering frame house, in which broad crevices were to be seen. "You don't mean that she is in there!" exclaimed Mr. Weston. "Why, the wind and snow can get into that place!"

"Mr. Weston," said Mr. Wrenchingfield, with quiet dignity, "this poor farm is leased each year to the lowest bidder. I was the lowest bidder before the court. I must make a living out of this work. Should I put those paupers in the main building, I would have to light fires in different rooms, and waste fuel. As it is, I huddle all the women into one place, and the men in another. So I get along with two fires for them. Of course, it is unpleasant to have to put the white people and negroes all together. But I am not doing this for fun. If the county court was willing to set a regular price for this work instead of auctioneering off their paupers, it would be different. But when I made such a bid as I did, and when the court appointed me overseer, they knew that with such a ridiculously low salary I couldn't feed the paupers on lemonade, or sleep them upon down, nor dress them in Brussels."

Without pausing to enquire into the character of Brussels, Mr. Weston followed into the women's apartment. It was a long room with bare floor, dingy walls and a line of low beds along one side. About the stove sat some very old women, one of them entirely blind. There was an idiot girl, who kept up a continual laughter that was dreadful to hear. Two dried-up and intensely black negresses were occupying the seats nearest the miserable fire. A woman with white hair stood by the grimy window, straining her eyes as she looked up the road. She was singing a hymn in a low voice. Mr. Weston caught the words—

> "Sure I must fight if I would reign,
> Increase my courage, Lord.
> I'll bear the toil, endure the pain,
> Supported by thy Word."

She was singing to herself that old-fashioned song, "Am I a Soldier of the Cross?" Some one had called for it in church not long before, and the young people had smiled at the unusual tune. But Mrs. Shaw was not thinking of the tune. In the spirit of the words she had risen above her condition, and she did not hear the idiot's ceaseless laughter. Mr. Weston stood silently gazing upon this scene. Then he said in a curious whisper, "And this is the end of the nineteenth century! This is 1898! It seems like a tragic chapter out of some old story of days long past!"

But as he spoke a low cry made his heart thrill. Mrs. Shaw, startled by the silence that had fallen upon the old women, had turned about. She looked into Washington's face with her dim eyes; for him she had been watching every day. She needed no one to tell her who he was, although he had deserted her when a young man.

"My boy!" she cried. Washington caught her in his arms, and they sobbed, while he tried to speak one word. But his sobs choked him. That word was "forgive!" But there was no need to speak it. Mr. Weston still gazed, as in a dream, upon the black faces, the cowering old women near the fire that was barely alive, the idiot girl, the cheerless walls. "Can it be true?" he said.

It was true.

RISEN WITH CHRIST.*

During the three years which Paul spent in Ephesus, after he started from Antioch on his missionary journey, there grew up in the region of Asia Minor, lying about Ephesus, a group of churches, the most representative of which are addressed in the opening chapters of the Apocalypse. The apostle does not seem to have gone out from his center of operations, but rather to have attracted to himself hearers who came from towns within a radius of a hundred miles to listen to the gospel, attracted perhaps by the reports which had gone out into the entire region. Among the churches thus planted there were three which lay very close to each other in the neighboring towns. Colosse, Laodicea and Hierapolis. The most prominent member of the first-named was Philemon, a man of influence in the community, whose wife, Apphia, and son, Archippus, were likewise earnest Christians. They seem to have opened their home for the little church which grew up in their city, and in the personal letter which Paul wrote to Philemon regarding the runaway slave, Onesimus, and in the epistle to the church these facts with others of interest concerning the gospel in Colosse are set forth. The occasion which called forth these two epistles was the departure of the evangelist Epaphras from Rome, where he had been visiting and receiving instruction from Paul during the latter's first imprisonment (62, 63, A. D.). He carried the two letters to Colosse, and along with him went the returning and converted slave boy, who had run away from his master.

The epistle to the Colossians, like the others of the period, Philippians and Ephesians, bears the stamp of Paul's maturest thought and his earnest desire to warn the churches against the dangers to which they were liable in that period, especially the allurements of philosophy, which came in the guise of Gnosticism. The tendency was to separate God and the world by infinite distance, and to make Jesus only one of a long series of intermediaries between the two. Therefore it is full of emphasis upon the Lordship and supremacy of Christ, and of exhortations to loyalty and to earnest efforts of toward the attainment of that new life which he brings to his followers. The full force of Paul's statement regarding this new life is to be seen by a careful examination of his thought concerning the old life, which he has given up, as set forth beginning at chapter 2:20. Indeed, the whole of the second chapter is full of warnings against the danger of being drawn away from the teachings of Jesus, to whom the life has been surrendered. To those living, as were the Colossians, in the midst of temptation to intellectual speculation, as well as to immorality, it was necessary that the apostle should address words of warning and caution such as these. But his words were never more needed than to-day, when the temptations which lie about the Christian are of a similar character. On the one side, he is confronted with theories which strip the Master of his true authority and divinity, and substitute for him a mere teacher of ethics or link in the chain of prophets. On the other hand, the allurements of the world were never more fascinating and seductive than in this period of marvelous industrial and mechanical progress. The thoughtful man is tempted to lose his faith in speculation. The practical man is inclined to be engrossed in the rush of modern life. To both classes the appeal of this lesson is emphatic. The old life is buried. The figure of Christ's death, burial and resurrection is applicable to the spiritual existence of the disciple who too is dead, not physically, but by abandoning the life of selfishness and indifference; who has passed with Christ, spiritually, through that process whereby he has emerged into the new life, whose vision is that of eternity and whose purposes are those of the Lord. To make the transition doubly impressive, the believer passes through an act of obedience which is the actual external picture of the inward spiritual process. His death to sin is emphasized by his burial in baptism, and his emergence from the water is the pledge that he has risen to walk in newness of life.

But the baptism is not merely external; if so it is as valueless as any other bodily act. It can only be valid when it is the consummation of the soul's surrender to Christ and the beginning of a genuinely new life. Things which were possible before become unnatural now. This does not mean that inclinations to sin are conquered at once; but the impulse of the new life is, or should be, constantly upward. Old things have passed away in their value and attractiveness. It is a new world in which the disciple lives. In that new world, accordingly, a new manner of life is expected. The resurrection of Christ has taken place in the soul. The life now lived is not the old life self-centered and satisfied, but that in which Christ is the center, and his purpose and spirit rule. These are the things which are above, i. e., they are the motives which prevail among the children of the kingdom in this world, and in the immediate presence of God.

They are the things which are therefore to be sought and whose absence from a Christian life denies its validity.

It is the purpose of the Christian to manifest the life of Christ, and the whole progress of this manifestation to the world through the church is called frequently in the New Testament "the appearing" or "manifestation of the Lord." At first thought this is likely to be interpreted as a visible, bodily return of our Savior to earth; but it is not of this that the apostle seems to be speaking here and in other similar passages and places. That the New Testament teaches that Christ will so return, need not be emphasized. It is rather of that manifestation which is continuously made of the Savior in the lives of his people that the apostle speaks. And when this result is reached in the individual Christian or in the collective life of the church, then Christ is manifested to the world, and the glory of the Christian life revealed. This manifestation of Christ in our lives constitutes our true glory, and still further, that glory is increased when the Christ within us is imparted to other lives and we see him appearing in them. Therefore the things which characterize the old life must be put away. They must be killed. Whatever is inconsistent with the presence of Jesus in the soul must be abandoned. Here is the one rule, the test by which all things may be judged. One needs no other discipline than to square all things by the character of the Master. Whatever is inconsistent with his presence must be put away. Such a life alone is worthy to be called the new life, and in it the characteristics of the old and the things for which the Jew and the Greek and the other classes of that old world respectively stood are left forever behind.

Paul does not mean, of course, that Jews, Greeks or barbarians are to be excluded from the church; but that in the church of the future those qualities for which the Jews, Greeks and barbarians respectively stood can have no place. The Jew was apt to be a formalist, a legalist, a worshiper of externals, one who revered the letter, but was blind to the spirit. The Greek was speculative, turning the metal of Christian life into the mold of philosophy, and therefore into the creed forms which have lasted so long. In the church of the future, toward which Paul looked, these things will not be present. That they are still with us to day is a proof of the fact that the ideal church which Paul had in his vision has not yet been reached.

The reverse of the shield is shown in the closing verses of the lesson. No more beautiful catalogue of Christian qualities has ever been formulated. To live in the atmosphere of these verses is to partake of the spirit of Christ, to have risen indeed to walk with him in newness of life. And herein, as was said last week, lies the secret of the real doctrine of the resurrection. To one who lives in such an atmosphere and with such purposes the resurrection is already real—eternal life has begun. Death is but an episode, a doorway, leading into larger opportunities and into fellowship with God.

TOPIC FOR JUNE 25.

SPIRITUAL GROWTH.

(Mark 4:26-32.)

Nothing stands still in this world. Everything changes, and constantly changes. Everything either grows or decays. There is no such thing as rest. The human body grows through a long course of years until it reaches its maximum of strength, and then it goes down the hill upon the side of weakness and decay. The spirit of men likewise develops through a long course of years, but, unlike the human body, it ought never to decay. Still, it will decay, unless it grows. Like all the rest of the world, it cannot stand still.

One is often discouraged, no doubt, for fear he has not grown, who nevertheless may have developed. So slow is the process that he has not seen it. One cannot see the growth of grain, one cannot see the growth of sands. It is only by comparing conditions widely separated in time that one can measure such growth.

It is a terrible thought to feel, "I have not grown." Endeavorers, is it possible for us to say, "I have not grown?" A year ago, at this time, were you in the same place that you are now, or have you advanced a bit further, or have you gone backward in spiritual condition?

One is measured in spiritual matters, not by what others are, but by what he himself once was. It is not a question of whether in the first place he had ten talents or two. All depends upon the comparison between the past and the present in one's own experience. We are tested by whether we have grown or not.

It is our one duty in this world to grow. What are those little children doing, as they rush about, aimlessly, it may appear, with no settled purpose in their play? They are doing their duty in the world, growing. We children of the larger play, what are we doing rushing about, aimlessly it might seem to some observer far above us in the sky, but nevertheless in all our laying of blocks and timbers one upon another, doing our work in the world, growing.

It doesn't matter much what one works at, so he grows. It is not necessarily the large sphere of action, it is not the great undertaking that calls forth the best effort. It may be the obscure task, the small circle of influence, the retired life, that is developing most rapidly, and therefore most blesses the world.

In the great factories of our cities visitors watch the vast timber being shaped, the great beams of iron being laid; their eyes are centered on these large sights; but yonder sits in the corner a workman at a little bench, unnoticed. He is the most skilled workman in the shop, making four to eight dollars a day in the busy season. So, in the world's workshop, many a one whose bench is small, whose house, office, farm, is obscure, is nevertheless one of God's skilled workmen. Is he growing? That is the question.

Lectures and Entertainments for Churches.

One of the collateral benefits which an Endeavor Society or a missionary society of a church can render the cause of religion and education is to provide good entertainments for the people. We have among us talent which is equal to that of other peoples, and yet do very little work in this line.

Prof. Ed Amherst Ott, Dean of the Drake University College of Oratory and English, says that in the last year he has given nearly one hundred lectures, and has appeared under the auspices of our own people only six or seven times. Universities, colleges, Y. M. C. A. and Chautauqua assemblies have listened to his lectures, but our own people seem to be the last to interest themselves in these matters.

Where our churches are too small to manage these matters, some of our people should have places on the local lecture courses, and this could be arranged by a little judicious work. It is worth thinking about.

SUMMER SCHOOL OF ORATORY.

Preachers, lawyers, teachers, and all people interested in Elocution and Physical Culture would find it to their advantage to attend the Summer Session of the DRAKE UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF ORATORY AND ENGLISH, and also attend the Mid land Chautauqua at the same time. Date, July 3rd to 21st.

Jesus and the Present Life.

By H. L. Willett, Director.

No teaching of our Lord's is more positive than that regarding the future life. He emphasized constantly the eternal issues of conduct. That death was not the end he showed, not only in his teaching, but in his restoration of the dead to life, and in his own resurrection. He found in the hearts of the Jewish people a belief in the future life which rested only on the hopes and longings of the men of the past. It was not a part of the ancestral faith of the Hebrew religion, which confined its vision and its hope to the present life of fellowship with God, or to such immortality as the continued existence of the nation, the deathlessness of a good name, or the blessing of abundant posterity could bring. It was only in the later periods of Hebrew thought, when disaster had fallen so heavily upon the national life that the earlier hopes for a great political future had to be abandoned, that there grew up the belief in personal immortality which finds expression in the later prophets and certain of the psalms. But this hope was hardly more than a longing, based on the soul's earnest wish to survive the present unsatisfying life. It was perhaps sufficient for the age, but Jesus gave it a firm basis by his teaching; and by his resurrection he brought life and immortality to light.

It is in the fourth Gospel especially that the sayings of Jesus regarding eternal life find record. Perhaps John's type of mind made more impressive to him the Savior's words on this theme. Certain it is that in the Synoptic Gospels the references to a future life are rare. Indeed, many of those which have been pressed into service as bearing upon the question are found, on more careful perusal, to speak only of the kingdom of heaven in its future manifestation among men. But in the fourth Gospel the teaching is clear. Jesus speaks of the man who believes in him as one whom he will "raise up at the last day" (John 6:40, 54). He tells Martha that he is the resurrection and the life, and that through him the dead shall live and the living shall never die (John 11:25). He assures the disciples that he is to go and prepare them a place and return for them (John 14:2, 3). But still more frequently does he refer to eternal life, not so much as a future reward, but rather as a quality of character actually possessed here and now by his true disciples, and therefore the pledge of all the blessings which eternity can hold. His teaching as recorded by John abounds in references to this characteristic of believers. He says those who partake of him as the true bread, i. e., those who receive his mind and purposes as their own, do not die (John 6:50). This does not mean that they will escape the dissolution of the body, but their lives are so united to him that death becomes only an episode in an unending life, begun at the moment the old life of sin is abandoned by obedience to him. In his great prayer Jesus declares that eternal life consists in a knowledge of the true God and his Son, the Christ (John 17:3). In harmony with this repeated teaching of the Master, John says in his first epistle that we may know that we have eternal life (4:13), and that eternal life is the knowledgd of the incarnation and of the Christ who is thus manifested; that it is the condition of being in Christ (5:20). John sees that to the Christian life is one. Death is not a break or separation. Nothing separates but sin.

Thus the clear teachings of our Savior on this most important theme are the comfort and stay of the church through the years. We may live our lives in entire confidence that fellowship with Jesus, begun here, is to be endless in duration, and limitless in satisfaction and progress.

And yet one is at first surprised to see how little Jesus talked about the future life. He spent his time rather in showing his disciples the true duties of the life that now is. The right condition of the soul, the proper relations of his followers in domestic, social and political life, their love to God as the root of all right conduct—these were the points he emphasized in his teaching. It has been the misfortune of the church and the world that so much attention has been given to the future life that sometimes the obligations of believers to the present life have been neglected. Much of the hymn book and other literature of the church has dwelt on this theme; prayer-meeting talks have taken this direction sometimes to the exclusion of present duties, and a morbid dissatisfaction with life and an indolent dreaming of the future has resulted. The teaching of Jesus does not encourage this. The program of the present life is so rich and full that the most troubled and distressed of us can say with Paul, "To live is Christ," as if one could not better phrase the immense joy and glory of living. The duty of the Christian lies in helping on the divine purpose to make this world the kingdom of our Lord. The program of the future life has not been issued as yet, but we may be assured that it will meet our most ardent expectations, and indeed if any joys it holds can be greater than that of service to Christ here and now, the happiness it reserves for us is complete.

GREECE.

The graceful national costume is disappearing throughout Greece. To-day it is worn only by peasants in and around Athens, and it is predicted that in another generation it will have entirely disappeared in favor of French styles made on Singer sewing-machines from English and American materials.

In 1894 the three peasants pictured on another page were photographed near Athens for the Singer National Costume series. The woman at the left wears the purely Greek dress consisting of a heavy white cotton skirt with a deep border of coarse embroidery. Over this is worn a cloak of the same material, reaching to the knees and made stiff, as are the sleeves, with bands of embroidery. A narrow apron worked with bright colors, a thin white veil over the head and neck, and bangles in Oriental fashion complete the costume.

The picturesque dress of the men is familiar to many people. Over the tight-fitting shirt and white trousers is worn a full, loose, white garment reaching almost to the knees. This is girdled at the waist by a silk sash used often as a pocket. Over this is worn a short, richly embroidered jacket with sleeves open from shoulder to wrist.

SCRIPTURE WORTHIES. By Rev. P. Spencer Whitman, D. D. Fleming H. Revell Co., Philadelphia, New York and Chicago, publishers. Cloth, 155 pages, $1.

The title of this book is amply suggestive of its character. The fullness of the character of the persons treated are well calculated to increase the reader's interest in the Bible and to appreciate more fully than ever before the excellence of some lives "that have been long under expositorial censure." Information concerning the actions of many of these biblical characters are given in the pages of this book not found in the commentaries and other treatises. This is an excellent book for young people, especially for young Bible students.

LIFE AND TIMES OF JOHN FRANKLIN ROWE: With Selections from his Writings and a Brief History of the Religious Controversy in which he took part. By F. M. Green. F. L. Rowe, publisher, Cincinnati.

This biographical sketch of the late editor of the Christian Leader opens up what might be called a closed chapter in the history of religious controversy among us. Bro. Rowe, who was born in 1827 at Greensburg, Pa., and who died in his 71st year at his residence in Akron, Ohio, was a graduate of Bethany College, a writer of considerable force and ability, and a man of earnest convictions. He took an active part in those discussions over the use of instrumental music in church worship and the propriety of missionary societies. He was an intense conservative, often more forcible than courteous in his method of opposition. In the later years of his life, however, there was evidence of a growing breadth of sympathy and charity which manifested itself in the paper of which he was editor. One of his editorials, written at this time, in which he pleaded for more toleration among Christian brethren, drew out such a storm of criticism from his readers as doubtless enabled him to sympathize as he never did before with some of the rest of us who have had to bear such criticisms from a similar class of critics through a long period of years.

Bro. Rowe's biographer, who had known him long and well, speaks sympathetically of his life and character and work, makes copious extracts from his editorials, and also from the writings of Isaac Errett, editor of the Christian Standard, as setting forth the two sides to the controversies of those days. Perhaps it was difficult for any of us in the midst of those days of conflict to do justice to the motives of those on the opposite side. We confess that it was always a difficult matter with us, accustomed as we have been to look at questions from all sides, and to seek to understand an opponent by looking at the question as far as possible from his point of view, to reconcile the course of the late editor of the Christian Leader with the highest principles of fidelity to one's own personal convictions, and with a large interest in the welfare of the cause. But as time passes on, and we look back at those controversies as things of the past, we find ourselves more disposed to throw the mantle of charity over any seeming inconsistencies, and to regard as true men those who bore a part in those discussions contrary to what seemed to us at the time right and just.

The subject of this biography had many admirable traits of character. These are brought out in this sympathetic sketch of his life, and he will, no doubt, occupy a place, and he deserves to occupy a place, in the history of the conflicts of that period, which we now look upon as a temporary phase in our religious development. The volume contains 226 pages and has illustrations of the subject of the sketch from boyhood and young manhood to age. It will be read with interest, especially by those who were readers and admirers of the Leader under its former editor.

MEN OF THE BIBLE. By D. L. Moody. Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago, publishers. Cloth, 126 pages; 30 cents net.

The things said of the characters are the things seen in their lives by D. L. Moody and expressed in his own effective style.

ANECDOTES, ILLUSTRATIONS AND INCIDENTS. By D. L. Moody. Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago, publishers. Cloth, 126 pages, 30 cents net.

ONE THOUSAND AND ONE THOUGHTS FROM MY LIBRARY. By D. L. Moody. Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago, publishers. Cloth, 396 pages, $1.00.

This book is valuable for its many suggestions, its practical comments and sidelights on daily vital questions.

We acknowledge the receipt of a copy of "Bright Melodies," a new song book edited by John R. Sweeney and J. H. Entwsel and published by John J. Hood, Philadelphia and Chicago. This book seems to us to contain an excellent collection of new and old songs and hymns for Sunday-schools, Endeavor Societies, public worship and evangelistic meetings.

STUDIES OF THE MIRACLES OF JESUS. By William H. Salmon, M. A. Published by the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Association, N. Y.

The above little book of 110 pages is suggestive and helpful. The outlines for study are mainly notes from the author's notebook as taught to voluntary classes for Bible study at Yale University and to a class of business men at Bridgeport, Conn.

BIBLICAL AUTHENTICITY. By L. L. Shearer, M. A. Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago and New York, publishers. Cloth, 72 pages, 50 cents.

The above book in a plain way attempts to meet such objections to the Bible as are commonly met with both in the world and in the church. As a whole it is a strong vindication of the Bible as the Word of God and rule of religious ethics.

THE STUDENT'S CHALLENGE TO THE CHURCHES. By Luther D. Wishard. Fleming H. Revell Co., publishers. Paper cover, 48 pages, 15 cents.

Though written for the Congregational Churches, the above little book, because of its expressed methods, opinions and suggestions will be found helpful in the study of the great work of the world's evangelization. It is a strong missionary document.

CHANGE OF HEART. By R E. L. Prunty, Unionville, Mo. Paper cover, 34 pages, 10 cents.

The above treatise of an old yet ever living question, while quite analytical in its character, is of interest, and will doubtless prove helpful to many souls. Our criticism is that not enough attention is given to the great moral and spiritual forces that work upon the heart in true Christian conversion. This tract is dedicated to the First Christian Church at Unionville, Mo., of which the author is the appreciated pastor.

OUR DAILY HOMILY. By Rev. F. B. Meyer. Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago, New York and Toronto, publishers. Five volumes. Cloth, $3.75 per set, 75 cents per vol.

The meditations of the heart of this great man of God upon Bible themes are a perennial fountain of spiritual food, and therefore read by the children of God with delight and profit. This series of books treat upon all of the books of the Bible in a way to encourage and enlighten the child of God. "Our Daily Homily" is their common title. There are few sweeter devotional writers than F. B. Meyer.

MAGAZINES.

The June number of the Ledger Monthly is full of matter of interest to women. In the Youth and Home department there is "A Lesson in Woodcraft," by Robert B. Buckham, illustrating methods employed in camping out and traversing the rivers and woods—an article of particular interest to all who contemplate going into the woods for a vacation.

The North American Review for June is devoted wholly to the great national problems and issues of our own and other leading nations of the world and will be a particularly interesting number to every person interested in great national questions. Lyman J. Gage, William J. Bryan, Nelson A. Miles and James Bryce, M. P., are some of the men of national and international reputation who have ably written articles in this number. Whether the authority which the names of the authors carry with them or the manner of treatment be considered, the list of articles is perhaps the most remarkable ever brought together in one number of the Review.

The Hon. John D. Long, Secretary of the Navy, contributes to Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly for June a complete and most interesting account of "The Building of the New Navy." It is a wonderful story, as true as it is wonderful, and the pictorial illustrations enhance its value. Secretary Long may well say: "Looking over the navy register, and noting the number and classes of the ships that compose the modern navy, it seems hardly possible that only thirteen years ago the first vessel of this formidable and effective force was put in commission." To-day, besides the formidable fleet in commission, we have actually building no less than fifty-three new vessels, including eleven battleships of the first class. Add to these the twelve more vessels just authorized by Congress, and we have a total of sixty-five vessels upon which work is in progress.

ARUFELT.

Peter Arufelt was born in Burk County, Penn., Nov. 19, 1826; died in Mt. Pulaski, Ill., April., 11, 1899; age 73 years, four months and 23 days. At the age of 13 he moved to Dayton, O., thence to Illinois in 1960. For 34 years he livhd on a farm near Mt. Pulaski; for two years in Kenney. In 1857 he married Miss Isabel Davis, who survives him. They were the parents of seven children; five daughters and two sons. One daughter and one son preceded him to the spirit-world. He was reared a Lutheran, but in 1876 he was immersed by Elder J. E. Cain and became a member of the New Union Church. He was one of those who made that church possible, donating the ground on which the building stood. He was a staunch supporter of the cause with his means, his presence and his life and character. The funeral was preached by Bro. L. M. Robinson. D.

HEMBREE.

Hugh L. Hembree was born in Warren County, Tenn., Sept. 18, 1820; died at his home in Dadeville, Mo., May 1, 1899. He came with his parents to Dade County in 1837, and obeyed the gospel under the labors of Joel Haden in the fall of 1838. He was a charter member of the first congregation of Disciples ever organized in this part of the country, and for more than 60 years he was a pillar in the congregation. He was married to Miss Annette Bender, April 29, 1844, who survives him. He was to her a faithful and true husband for more than 55 years. To them were born 11 children, seven sons and four daughters, seven of whom are mourning the loss of a father, four having gone on before him to the better land. The funeral services were held in the Christian Church in Dadeville. After the services at the church the remains were conveyed to the Rice cemetery, where they were laid to rest by the side of his children. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

JEFFERSON.

On Tuesday night, May 9, 1899, passed from earth to heaven the pure soul of Mrs. S. M. Jefferson. She died in her home in Berkley, California, and was buried May 11th, in Mountain View cemetery, Oakland. The funeral services were conducted at the residence by Bro. A. M. Elston. All who knew her loved her. She had the secret of winning hearts. Her friends are found wherever her influence has been known. She will be missed as "the presence of a good diffused." Of some one it was said, "He is more than s teacher; he is an atmosphere." Mrs. Jefferson carried about her the atmosphere of love, cheerfulness, kindliness and sympathy. Her smile was an inspiration. Her soul shone ih her face. Her unselfishness was something beautiful. She bad entered lnto the joy of her Lord—the joy of doing good—long ago. She did not need to wait for some other world in which to find this blessedness. Her whole life exemplified the happiness of service. Mrs. Julia Jefferson was born August 27, 1860, in Beirut, Syria, where her father was laboring as a missionary of the cross. She was the daughter of Dr. Robert G. Barclay and Louise Hampton and granddaughter of Dr. James T. Barclay, author of "The City of the Great King." She came to the United States in 1866—after the death of her mother—where she spent her useful life. My acquaintance with her began in Louisville, Ky. She was a member of the old Fourth and Walnut Sts. Church, in which she was a most active and earnest worker. How she loved her Sunday-school class and how the children loved her! She was a conscientious Christian. Her religion was no ornament, worn on Sunday, but was the controlling and energizing influence of her whole life. It was a real and as much a part of her very self as the blood which coursed in her veins. She was a woman of fine literary appreciation and keenly alive to the beautiful in nature, art, literature and life. She was educated in the Augusta Female Seminary, Staunton, Virginia, the late principal of which, Miss Mary Baldwin, was her cousin. On March 7, 1888, she was married to our well-known and highly honored Bro. S. M. Jefferson. It was my very great pleasure to pronounce the marriage ceremony. This wedded life was a truly happy one, and for her home-life was heart-life. Bro. Jefferson has indeed been bereaved. He has to comfort him the presence of his three little daughters—Mary, Louise and Ruth—but none the less does he long for "the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still." May God bless him in his sorrow. Besides her husband and children Mrs. Jefferson leaves a sister—Mrs. R. K. Edwards, of Birmingham, Alabama. May the presence of the tender Christ be with these stricken ones and show to them that his touch can still heal the broken-hearted. I believe that our dear friend would have wished to be true of herself those lines of Tennyson:

"Twilight and evening star,
And one clear call for me,
And let there be no moaning of the bar
When I put out to sea."

MEISNER.

Lena May Meisner was born in Wilson County, Kas., Dec. 12, 1883 and died May 17, 1899, in Kansas City, Mo. The funeral services were conducted at the Vine St. Mission, of which she was a member. Lena was a noble Christian girl with a strong faith in Jesus and a pure heart. Her school class with which she would have graduated attended in a body. Lena was identified with the Sunday-school and Juniors, and when able was always present. She was not afraid to die. Blessed are such servants. She will await our coming.

MORRO.

Amelia H. Morro, wife of H. E. Morro, was born in Culenborg, Holland, May 23, 1843. She came to America with her parents in 1848. She confessed Christ and was baptized by G. B. Hancock, May, 1885. The death-angel called for her May 26, 1899. She leaves a husband and five children to mourn her departure. She lived a devoted Christian life. She requested the writer to conduct the funeral from Psalms 90 and 103, also 1 Cor. 15. Songs, "Jesus lover of my soul," the "Open Gate." We laid her to rest in the Viola cemetery to await the resurrection. G. G. Cottrell.

PERKINS.

Mrs. Rachel Perkins, to whom you have been sending your paper since April, 1898, is dead. She was born February, 1814, married Mr. Burrel Perkins in 1839, was the mother of eight children, of whom five preceded her to the spirit-land. She joined the church in 1859. Died, Feb. 26, 1899, making a membership in the church of 40 years. Her last words were, "I love all my neighbors." L. W. Jones.

Publishers' Notes.

"The Science and Pedagogy of Ethics," a text-book by H. W. Everest, LL. D., Dean of the Bible College of Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa, will be in press this week. The subject is treated under the following heads: Part First, Theoretical Ethics; Part Second, Practical Ethics; Part Third, Pedagogical Ethics. "If parents shall find help in this volume, if students shall find find it lucid and well-founded, if those preparing to teach shall find it supplies a want in our Normal schools, and if the preachers of the gospel shall find here a wonderful harmony between science and revelation, the purpose of the author will have been realized."—Extract from Author's Preface.

"Men of Yesterday" is a handsome volume of 291 pages from the pen of T. W. Grafton, author of "Life of Alexander Campbell," and from the presses of the Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis. It is a series of character sketches, of some of our prominent men: Walter Scott, Barton W. Stone, John Smith, Isaac Errett, Barton W. Johnson and O. A. Burgess. These men are worthy of these sketches, and the sketches are worthy of the men. It is a mistake not to keep before our minds men of this class. Their histories will inspire noble lives in others. The author is happy in his chosen field, happy in the title of book, and happy in the treatment of his subjects. Not long enough to be wearisome, and not so brief as to be unsatisfactory. Busy people and and young men and women by the thousands will read such a book, who will not read the larger biographies. M. M. DAVIS.

"QUEEN ESTHER." The first opportunity I have had of reviewing this book occured only the other day. I read it at a single sitting, and this fact is indicative of the interest which it inspired. I want to say a word about it. It is the best book to place in the hands of young people that I have read for many a day. It is pure and sweet and good; it is instructive and fascinating; and what else would you have in a book? The treatment is admirable. The great queen lives before us. She is no longer a myth, but a living woman, animated with every womanly instinct, and bearing the cross laid upon her with the fortitude of a real heroine. Bro. Davis has succeeded in the portrayal of all his characters in a manner at once skillful and attractive. The hand of the true artist is seen in every page, while the practical lessons deduced from the narrative are all that can be desired. To aid in the circulation of this book is to do a good work, and I cannot hence forbear this notice.

DAVID WALK.

The Council of Seventy.

The following summer courses will be conducted by the American Institute at various assemblies during the coming season:

At Chautauqua, N. Y., (July 8 to August 18), Chancellor O. C. S. Wallace, of McMaster University, will present daily studies in the Life of Christ for three weeks. During the second three weeks Professor George L. Robinson, of McCormick Theological Seminary, will give five hours a week to the Old Testament Wisdom. Professor Robinson will also conduct studies in Palestinian Geography. This course will be based upon facts of personal observation gained in traveling both in Palestine proper, as well as in Moab, Syria, Mt. Lebanon, Palmyra, Greece and Egypt. George Adam Smith's "Historical Geography of Palestine" will be used as a guide, though not as a text-book. The Palestine Park Model will be used.

In the University of Chicago (July 1 to September 23) courses in Hebrew and the Cognate New Testament Greek and the English Bible courses, both linguistic and interpretive, will be offered by the following members of the faculty and others: Professors George Adam Smith, William R. Harper, Ernest D. Burton, Shailer Mathews, Robert F. Harper, James H. Breasted, Herbert L. Willett, C. W. Votaw, Henry T. DeWolfe.

At Lake Madison, South Dakota, (June 20 to July 13) Professor Edward L. Parks, of Atlanta, Ga., will give daily class instructions in the Teachings of Jesus. Conferences on systematic Bible study will be frequent.

At Delavan, Wisconsin, (July 26 to August 6) Professor C. F. Kent, of Brown University, will give a daily study for ten days on The Crises in Israel's History and their Political and Religious Significance, with occasional lectures on other Bible subjects.

At Pertle Springs, Missouri, (August 15 to 24) Professor Sylvester Burnham will lecture daily upon The Times and Ministry of Isaiah.

At Winfield, Kansas, (June 20 to 29) Dr. Herbert L. Willett will conduct daily studies in The Life of Christ.

At Bay View, Michigan, (July 19 to August 10) Professor George L. Robinson will teach for ten days classes in The Beginning of Hebrew History, and in the Wisdom Literature. He will also give daily lectures in Palestinian Geography. These courses will be followed by a ten days' series of lectures in Post-Exilic History to the Times of Christ, and The Missionary Journeys of St. Paul, by Professor Shailer Mathews, of the University of Chicago.

At Ocean Park, Maine, (August 2-9) Prof. Alfred W. Anthony will give seven lectures on The Unrecorded Life of Jesus. At the Goodwill Assembly, E. Fairfield, Maine, (July 31 and August 1) Professor Anthony will give two biblical addresses.

The fifth annual session of the Maine Ministers' Institute, conducted by the faculty of Cobb Divinity School, Lewiston, Maine, in affiliation with the American Institute of Sacred Literature, will he held September 4 to 12, 1899. The work is arranged in five departments of seven lectures each.

At Monteagle, Tennessee, (August 13 to 19) President George S. Burroughs, of Wabash College, will lecture daily on a subject to be announced.

Educational Day in Missouri.

The first Lord's day in July, or the next regular meeeting day in any church is Educational Day. In Missouri the Educational Conference, through its executive committee, asks every Christian congregation to observe the day by having a sermon on education and making donations for our colleges. Each congregation is kindly solicited to give, if possible, as much as an average of one dollar per member. Any giver or church has the right to specify to what college and for what purpose the gift shall be devoted, and the executive committee will faithfully follow such instructions. All funds not specifically directed will be divided among the colleges by the committee.

To make this donation a success, a committee should be appointed in each congregation to make a thorough canvass privately with the aim to raise as much as requested. This committee should see every member and take his subscription, patiently explaining to him the purpose and need of such funds. If in any case the canvass should not reach all the members, opportunity should be given at church on Educational Day to make the desired contribution.

Our preachers in every part of the state are earnestly requested to preach on education the first Lord's day in July, or the next preaching day in any church, setting forth the necessity of education, the necessity of its being Christian and the necessity of means to provide such education. He should speak of the glory of colleges to any religious people, of their power to sustain a great cause and of the misfortune and discredit of their being neglected. He will certainly not forget the young people of our Christian homes, their usefulness in every relation of life, their worthiness of the best training the church can give and the splendid future achievements for the kingdom of God that must result from their instruction.

It is to be hoped that no congregation will depend upon a Sunday morning basket collection for this cause, now too long neglected, for such a collection would surely fail to meet so great needs. Much will depend upon the preachers to see that these committees are appointed in the churches and that they push their work to a worthy completion. No other effort of the church involves more of her future growth and power. No other has been longer obscured by conflicting claims and no other should now appeal with greater reason and pathos to the generosity of a wise and liberal brotherhood. A people who for many years have appealed to learning to vindicate their plea, and who from the first have founded and patronized colleges, will not now be inattentive to so urgent a call at a time of so great need. CLINTON LOCKHART.

What We Plead For

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition,
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

CURRENT EVENTS.

While the United States and Russia furnish the bulk of the world's petroleum and stand almost abreast in the quantity of crude oil produced, the amount of refined illuminating oil supplied by the United States far exceeds that furnished by Russia. A table just prepared by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics shows the quantity of mineral oil produced by the various countries in 1897, the latest available year, also the quantity produced in the United States and Russia in each year since 1883. This statement shows that while the quantity of crude oil produced in the two great oil-producing countries in the world, the United States and Russia, is nearly equal, the quantity of refined illuminating oil produced by the United States is more than double that produced by Russia. This is due to the fact that a given quantity of United States oil produces three-fourths of its bulk in refined illuminating oil, while the same quantity of Russian oil produces about three-eighths of its bulk in refined illuminating oil. Sumatra, next to Russia, is the most formidable competitor of the United States because of the rapid growth in its production of oil, the fact that its crude oils produce half their quantity in refined illuminating oil, and the further fact that they are much nearer to the Orient, the countries of which form an important part of the world's market for this class of exportations. Up to the present time, however, the quantity of oil produced in Sumatra is small compared with that of the United States or Russia, its figures for 1897 being but 72,258,000 gallons, against 2,543,000,000 gallons for the United States.

The arbitration tribunal provided for under the administration of President Cleveland, to settle the boundary dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela, began its formal sessions in Paris on the 15th inst. Chief Justice Fuller and Justice Brewer represent Venezuela in the board of arbitrators, while Gen. Harrison and Gen. Tracy act as counsel for the same. The arbitrators meet in the same room which was occupied by the Spanish-American Peace Commission. Foreign Minister Delcasse made a brief introductory address of welcome, expressing the honor which Paris felt in being chosen for the meeting-place of a tribunal composed of such eminent men. M. de Martens, president of the board, responding, laid great stress on the advantages of arbitration. As he is a prominent member of the Russian delegation to the Peace Conference at the Hague, it is hoped that the meeting of this board will have a good influence on the proceedings of that body. At the suggestion of Gen. Harrison the tribunal will meet only four days of the week. The proceedings of this tribunal will be watched with interest, as it has full power to make a final settlement of the question at issue, and constitutes a notable triumph of the principle of arbitration in settling international differences, in which this government will have borne a leading part.

In a recent paragraph we called attention to the civil service order of President McKinley, expressing the fear that the President had been influenced to issue the order under the pressure of politicians, who desired to use the offices as rewards for party service. We stated at the same time, however, that we had seen no explanation of the President's action, and our hope that some explanation would be made that would throw light on the subject. Since then we have seen a reported interview with Secretary Gage, who justifies the President's action on the ground that it was merely making corrections which practical experience in the public service under the operation of the civil service law had shown to be necessary. The Chicago Record of the 16th inst., in its editorial correspondence from Washington, says that "considerable misrepresentation might have been avoided if those who are familiar with the facts had furnished the public with a lucid explanation of the nature and effect of the recent order of the President, by withdrawing from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission certain subordinates of the several executive departments." More than half of the persons affected by this order, the Record says, are in the War Department, and "comprise casual and temporary employees of the engineer corps and the quartermaster, commissary and medical departments of the army, such as carpenters, masons, painters, blacksmiths, stone cutters, machinists, teamsters, packers, helpers, laborers, watchmen, guardians, hostlers, etc." It has been found, the Record says, "that the ordinary Civil Service rules cannot be applied to this class of men for several reasons." Among these are the fact that a number of men refused to submit to an examination, not caring to be at the expense of going to Washington, and the other fact is that the examination provided does not determine the fitness of the candidates for the various positions. These facts, however, would seem to us to suggest the need of some modification of Civil Service rules so as to adapt the examination to the purpose they are intended to serve rather than withdrawing the classes of employees mentioned from the operation of the Civil Service laws. We are sure that the American people, with a certain class of politicians excepted, desire the success of Civil Service reform, and will not approve of any backward step.

At the instigation of Governor Sayers, of Texas, a meeting of the governors of various states, together with their attorney-generals, is to be held in the city of St. Louis, September 20th, for the purpose of agreeing upon some uniform legislation concerning trusts. The Attorney-General of the United States recently expressed the opinion that the several states would have to deal with this evil since the United States Government could not do it so effectively without interference with the prerogatives of the states. It is probable, however, that it will require the co-operation of the various state governments with the national government to prevent the evils likely to flow from the rapid multiplication of trusts. In any event, the need of uniform legislation among the states, and of conference on the subject in order to ascertain what kind of legislation will prove most effective, is evident. Governor Sayers has had favorable responses from a large number of governors, expressing their willingness to attend such a conference and their hearty sympathy with its purpose, and this without regard to their party affiliations. It is probably neither desirable nor practicable to prevent the co-operation of men engaged in the same general industry to promote their own interests. The combination of capital for this purpose alone is not a matter against which legislation should be aimed, but when these combinations have for their object the aggrandizement of certain individuals and corporations at the expense of the public, it becomes a matter of grave public concern and demands the wisest and most effective legislation.

It begins to look as if the Peace Conference now in session at the Hague will have for its net result nothing more, perhaps, than some agreement to recommend to the various governments represented some form of international arbitration. Even this proposal is not likely to meet with the endorsement of all the delegates to the conference. One of Germany's representatives made a speech a few days since opposing arbitration as a method of settling international disputes on the ground that it was not in harmony with the idea of the divine right of a sovereign to have the question of peace or war taken out of his hands to be decided by another tribunal! Silence followed this deliverance until it was broken by a remark of Sir Julian Pauncefote, representative of Great Britain, to the effect that the speech of the honorable gentleman was "hardly in harmony with modern theories of statecraft"—a remark which went straight to the heart of the difficulty in the case of Germany. If nothing more, however, should come of the Peace Conference than an agreement upon some method of international arbitration, the outcome of it would abundantly justify the holding of such a conference. It was the prediction of this paper in the beginning that this was likely to be the most practicable subject for consideration and agreement among the representatives of the great powers in the conference. An effective tribunal of international arbitration, when its effectiveness has once been demonstrated, will do more to promote disarmament than anything else that could be devised. It will not be to the credit of any nation to put itself in opposition to such an important and far-reaching measure.

Richard P. Bland, of Lebanon, Mo., for twenty years a representative of his district in Congress, died at his home at 4:30 A. M., on the 15th inst. Mr. Bland was born in Ohio county, Ky., in 1835. Left an orphan at an early age and thrown upon his own resources, he worked upon a farm in summer, and saved sufficient money out of his small earnings to pay for his way at school in winter. At the age of 18 he entered the Hartford (Ky.) Academy and took a teacher's course for one year, and spent sometime afterwards in teaching school. In 1855 he went to California and spent ten years in that state and in Nevada and Colorado, teaching school, studying, and afterwards practicing law. He returned to Missouri in 1865 and practiced law for three years in Rolla, and then removed to Lebanon, which became his home until the time of his death. He was first elected to Congress in 1872, and was re-elected to each succeeding Congress until 1894, but was re-elected at the next election. Mr. Bland was a staunch member of the Democratic party, and from the beginning of his legislative career he was closely identified with the silver movement, being familiarly known as "Silver Dick." Mr. Bland was by far the most prominent candidate for the nomination for the Presidency by his party in 1896 prior to the assembling of the convention, but when the nomination fell to Mr. Bryan he did not sulk in his tent, but gave earnest advocacy to the candidacy of Mr. Bryan. He was a man in whose honesty and integrity the people of the country generally had confidence without respect to party. Mr. Bryan has pronounced him the ablest champion of free silver, or bimetallism, which the country has produced. His death will be universally lamented as that of an able, experienced and honest statesman, who sought the welfare of his country and of the common people, with whom he was always in close sympathy.

Chicago has set an excellent example to other cities in organizing a Municipal Art League to look after the artistic beautifying of the city. One does not need a very artistic eye to notice in any of our cities violations of the simplest laws of artistic beauty. The object of this new organization, which embraces some of the leading citizens of Chicago, is stated as follows: "The Municipal Art League of Chicago shall consist of an associtation organized for the purpose of providing adequate sculptural and pictorial decorations for the public buildings and parks in the city of Chicago and to promote in every practical way the beautifying of the streets and public places. The justification for the organization of this society, composed of artists and laymen, is based upon the four general considerations: The need of an awakened civic conscience in relation to public art, the needs of the city as regards works of beauty, the noteworthy opportunities which exist for the adornment of the city and the present favorable conditions." The Executive Board will consist of three architects, three sculptors, three painters, the mayor, representatives of the Park Boards and the Cook County commissioners. An active and efficient organization of this kind can hardly fail to exert a beneficial effect upon any city.

The campaign in the Philippines continues active in spite of the rainy season. The latest conflict has proved to be one of the severest battles thus far fought. It was in the Province Cavite, and under the direction of General Lawton. The enemy made a very vigorous stand at the Zapote River, from which they were driven, however, by General Lawton's forces with severe loss. General Otis cables that one-third of the Filipinos' army were killed or disabled in this battle, in which General Lawton was aided materially by the co-operation of the navy. General Otis also cables that the "inhabitants in that country rejoice at deliverance and welcome with enthusiastic demonstrations the arrival of our troops." Admiral Watson has arrived at Hong Kong, and has taken command of the Asiatic squadron which, since Admiral Dewey's departure, has been under the command of Captain Baker, of the Oregon. General Luna is reported as having been assassinated by the friends of Aguinaldo, and there is an unconfirmed rumor that Aguinaldo in turn has been assassinated by some of General Luna's forces. The American people will rejoice at the termination of this unfortunate war in the Philippines.

According to a special dispatch to the St. Louis Republic, June 19th, the dispute between Canada and the United States has suddenly taken on a more serious aspect. The announcement that Lord Salisbury and Ambassador Choate had agreed upon a modus vivendi line was hailed as the beginning of the end of the trouble. But it is now stated that Canada will not accept the provisional line of the proposed modus vivendi and that England must choose between Canada and the United States. This, of course, has stopped negotiations on the modus vivendi and leaves both parties at sea as to a solution of the difficulty. The essential points on the provisional line agreed to by the United States in the proposed modus vivendi were the White Summit at the Canadian Custom House, the Chilkoot Pass at the Canadian Custom House, and a point on the Dalton Trail, in the Chikoot Pass, which left the Indian village of Kluchman on the American side. But the report now is that Canada will not accept this line, and all negotiations looking toward a peaceful solution of the trouble are said to be at least temporarily blocked. Canada still asks for a tidewater port and the United States has nothing more to offer than stated in the provisional line. But dark as the problem now looks it is to be hoped that new light will break in upon it from some quarter and this troublesome Alaskan boundary question find a speedy and permanent settlement.

FIDELITY AND CHARITY.

Do these two words convey opposite meanings? We might imagine that such was the case from some things we hear and see. We are fully persuaded, however, that they both stand for essential elements of Christian character. Not only are they not antagonistic, but each demands the other as its complement. Fidelity comes from the same root as faith, and is the practical side of faith. It is faith at work or under trial, proving itself true and genuine. Charity, otherwise known as love, we know to be a cardinal Christian virtue. Paul puts faith, hope and love together as an abiding trinity, and pronounces the greatest of these to be love. He had no thought of there being any conflict between faith and love, and surely there can be none between fidelity and love.

But, as we have said, there are those who speak and act as if these terms were inconsistent with each other and mutually exclusive. Here is a brother, let us suppose, who believes on Christ as the divine Savior, and who is loyal to Him and to His teaching according to the measure of his understanding of the mind of the Master. But let us suppose that he is in error, according to the general understanding among us, concerning certain theories that do not affect his Christian character. At least he differs from most of us, and we generally agree to call that error which differs from the generally accepted view, although it sometimes turns out to be the truth. The question arises: What does fidelity require in the case, and what does charity or love require? Are they antagonistic in their demands? We think not. Fidelity to Jesus Christ requires that we uphold the standard of His teaching as He has given us to understand it, and to exalt His authority above that of all merely human teachings. Charity requires that we do this in the spirit of brotherly kindness and with due regard to the well-being and reputation of our brother; that we do not judge him harshly; that we do not, above all things, misrepresent him or seek to injure him, but to put the most favorable interpretation allowable on his utterances, and to bear with him even when he is in error, while we seek to impart to him what we believe to be a truer view of the question at issue.

Just here is where the mistake is usually made. In our zeal for the faith, and for the things which we believe to grow out of or to be intimately connected with the faith, we forget the claims of love which our brother has upon us and fail to treat him with that courtesy and kindness which are far more potent in winning a brother from his error than over statement, harsh judgment and unfriendly criticism. In this course we not only violate the demands of charity, but we are lacking as well in fidelity. We have not been faithful to the principle of love, which is more vital, after all, than even faith. Never was there greater need, we believe, in any age of the world for these two cardinal virtues of fidelity and charity than at the present time. The Bible is undergoing the most critical investigation to which it has ever been subjected. Many views which have been regarded as fixed are undergoing modifications, old theories are being discarded as inadequate to explain all the facts, and new views are being presented and advocated. A hundred questions relating to the Bible, and possessing more or less importance, are as yet unsettled. But none of these affect, or ought to affect, our faith in Christ and loyalty to Him and our love for one another. But this condition of things does require the exercise of that love which is greater than even faith or hope, and is far greater than knowledge. It is certain that we are not all going to see alike on all these disputed questions. We may be one in faith, but it is not at all probable, nor do we know that it is desirable, that we should be one in opinion concerning every question of biblical criticism. In this state of things we will be under the necessity, either of following the example of some of our religious neighbors and engaging in a series of heresy trials, in order to enforce uniformity in our theories and opinions, producing strife and confusion, if not division, or else we must exercise larger charity, greater tolerance, larger liberty of thought and freedom of investigation.

Those who have any intelligent comprehension of our religious position need not be told that the latter course alone is consistent with our position and plea. Our distinction between faith and knowledge, or faith and opinion, amounts to little if it does not furnish a guarantee against interference with fraternity and fellowship while exercising the liberty of differing in opinion from others. This has been one of its beneficent results in the past, and is bound to be increasingly so in the future. This position of fidelity to Christ as the true object of Christian faith, and loyalty to Him as the true test of Christian fellowship, with freedom of thought on all questions of theory and interpretation, fits us well for passing safely through the trying times in which we live, the ordeal of criticism through which the Bible and Christianity are passing. If we can only have the wisdom to see the adaptation of this position to the conditions of our time, and the fidelity that will enable us to stand unflinchingly by our principles, we shall be able to demonstrate to the world that our fathers were providentially guided when they lifted the banner of religious reform, in making this distinction one of its cardinnl characteristics.

Our position is destined to undergo a severer test in the next twenty-five years than it has ever undergone in the past. We are raising up a group of scholarly men, the number of whom will steadily increase, who will enter along with other Christian scholars into the realm of biblical criticism and investigation. We cannot expect that the results of their investigations will always be entirely satisfactory to the rest of us or to each other. We have a right, however, to expect that they will be loyal to Jesus Christ and to the teaching of the men whom He commissioned and qualified to communicate His will to the world. As to the rest, we must have patience. Time will accomplish much. Growth in Christian knowledge and character will throw off a good many erroneous notions. An error held to-day may be outgrown to-morrow.

Let the men who lead be cautious in the new views which they accept, and prove themselves to be safe leaders. Let the rest of us who follow be patient, tolerant, charitable, and the outcome will be all right. This is the policy or rather the principle that has held us together in the past. It is the only course that will enable us to steer safely between the Scylla and Charybdis of opposite extremes in the future. So shall we be found "sound in faith and charity," and will show ourselves to be loyal and loving disciples of Him who, while unswerving in His loyalty to His Father, did not quench the smoking flax nor break the bruised reed.

CHRISTIANITY AND EDUCATION.

(2 Peter 1:5-9; Heb. 5:12:14.)

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topics, June 28th, 1899.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: It is the purpose of the Christian religion to give to man the highest possible mental and moral development, and education must supplement regeneration to accomplish this end.

Next Lord's day is Educational Day throughout our churches in the United States. It is the day set apart for the consideration of the importance and needs of our educational institutions, to which we are looking for the educated and trained men and women who are to be our leaders in all the activities of the future. It is a day, too, in which these institutions are to be remembered in our prayers that God's blessing may rest upon them, and that they may be wisely guided in accomplishing the great work that is committed to them. The topic for this prayer-meeting evening has been selected with reference to Educational Day.

In the passage quoted from 2 Peter it is seen that Christian life is a divine and orderly progression. Faith is the fundamental condition of our growth because it is through faith that we come into right relations with God who is the source of all life and of all knowledge. But, having come into union with God in Christ, we are not to tarry at the threshold of the church or of the Christian life, but to go on adding these various graces to our Christian character. This is the process of Christian education. How much our colleges have done to lay the foundation for this kind of Christian growth is known to all intelligent observers. Their influence is to intensify our zeal and to enlarge it, to widen the mental horizon, to deepen the spiritual life, to promote the various forms of religious activity and hence Christian growth.

Let it be noted that in the revised rendering of the passage from Peter it is in the exercise of these various graces in their order that the following grace is to be added; that is, in the exercise of our faith we supply virtue or heroism, in the exercise of our courage or heroism we supply knowledge, and in the use of knowledge we acquire temperance or self-control, and so on. This means that the Christian life, if it is to be a life of growth and development, must be a very active life.

In the other Scripture reference we find a strong rebuke administered to the Hebrew Christians because they had not made the progress in knowledge that they ought to have made, considering the time that they had been Christians. Instead of being able to teach others, they needed some one to teach them the very rudiments of the gospel. Instead of being able to use solid food, they needed to be fed with milk like babes. Evidently the author of the Hebrew letter had no sympathy with the class of stationary Christians who refused to go on to perfection, but contented themselves with a few elementary principles of the gospel. How many thousands there are in our churches to-day who are subject to this same rebuke! They feel under no obligation to make constant increase in their knowledge of God's Word and of divine things. They do not believe in new ideas. They are opposed to progression. They are religious pullbacks. They have never learned that one of the worst as well as one of the most common forms of heresy is in shutting the mind against new truth. The education which this class of Christians has is a false education in that it produces an unwillingness to receive additional light. Let us beware of this—one of the subtlest and deadliest forms of heresy.

There is no place in the Christian life for sloth, for idleness, for ignorance. The whole spirit of Christianity is in favor of development and growth. The type of Christianity that does not foster Christian education, that does not build, endow and equip institutions of Christian learning, is not the true type. If we fail in furnishing adequate support for our colleges and higher institutions of learning, we shall have furnished the highest proof that there is something radically wrong in our conception of the Christian religion. It is as true of the church as it is of the nation: "We must educate or we must perish."

PRAYER.

O Thou who art the God of knowledge and of all wisdom, we thank Thee that in our creation Thou hast made us in thine own image and endowed us with faculties and with powers capable of endless growth and development. We thank Thee for the great Teacher which Thou hast sent into the world, not only to give us life, and that more abundantly, but to instruct us in the knowledge of God and to inspire within the human mind and heart the desire for the highest and best things. We thank Thee for our colleges and universities and for the work which they have accomplished in the advancement of Thy kingdom. We pray Thee that we may have larger and better views of our obligations to support these institutions of learning, that they may better accomplish the great work that is laid upon them. Bless the trustees, the faculties and students of these various institutions, and so fill them with Thy Spirit and with Thy truth as to enable them to fulfill their respective obligations. In Christ's name. Amen!

In the course of a sermon at the Brick Presbyterion Church in New York recently the pastor, Dr. Henry Van Dyke, said he believed that the world was better to-day than it had been, because the church had advanced by holding fast to that which was good, while, at the same time, it had not feared to take up new thought when the new was better than the old. "The union of conservatism and liberality," said Dr. Van Dyke, "is the only safe course for the church to follow." He added that in a satisfactory statement of belief the points to emphasize are these ten: First, the fullness of the Fatherhood of God; second, the Sonship of Christ; third, the all-sufficiency of Christ's atonement; fourth, the living presence of the Holy Ghost; fifth, the sovereignty of God; sixth, the liberty of every soul to be with God or against God; seventh, the joining of the soul to God; eighth, the supreme authority of the Bible; ninth, the absolute necessity of love and good works; tenth, the immortal life of heaven. —Literary Digest.

MACATAWA MUSINGS.

Macatawa! Many of our readers have noticed this word before. It has entered quite largely into the literature of this department during the summers of the decade past. It suggests a wooded shore, wide-stretching views over Lake Michigan, glorious sunsets, cool breezes, the thunder of breaking waves, and the gentler music of sighing trees and singing birds. It is a word to conjure with. It brings up associations with some of the choicest spirits we have ever known. For, after all, what are the most beautiful and inspiring scenes of nature, unless there be kindred spirits with whom you can have fellowship in the enjoyment of them? Yes, we are at Macatawa, and as far as possible we desire that all our readers shall enjoy with us whatever of beaty and inspiration and delight we may find here that can be translated into words. This is why we write.

It had been a warm, muggy day in Chicago, full of meetings, consultations and interviews. An increasing number of Chicago friends makes it more and more impossible to pass through without tarrying awhile in their association. At seven o'clock the good steamer, "Soo City," left its moorings at No. 1, State Street, steamed slowly down that crystal current, known as Chicago River, through a line of massive lake passenger steamers and freighters, into the great lake, and turned its prow to the northeast toward the Eden of Macatawa. On board we met a number of familiar faces bound for the same port as ourselves, who, like ourselves, were returning to a place they had learned to love. When well out into the lake, a dark cloud rose on the western horizon, and threatened a storm during the night. The weather prognostications in the evening paper spoke of squalls on the lake, followed by a northwestern gale. The timid had uneasy forebodings of a heavy sea and mal de mer. But in spite of the ominous outlook, we had a swift and smooth passage. There were thunder storms and heavy rain during the night, but the northwest gale did not set in until we had passed through the channel at Macatawa, and had steamed up through the quiet waters of Black Lake to Holland, where we continued our rest until the usual hour of rising, and returned by electric cars to Macatawa along the southern shore of the little lake.

It was a glorious morning! The clouds and storms of the past night had swept by, leaving a clear sky and bringing a brisk, cool and bracing breeze down over the lake from the northwest. A spring overcoat was comfortable. A blazing fire at Edgewood-on-the-Lake, following immediately the taking down of the storm shutters from windows and doors, added no little to the comfort of the situation. Even at this writing, the day following our arrival, the temperature suggests October, and our stenographer, to whom we are dictating these lines in our study, is wrapped in a Mexican serape, while we pace the floor to keep up the circulation. Just at this juncture, we were interrupted by a visit from Brother Musselman, from St. Louis, of the Paris Medicine Company, who came to bring us a string of white bass which he caught last night. He has only been here a few days, and this is his first catch. He is naturally enthusiastic, as any good fisherman would be under the circumstances. Ordinarily our neighbors do not need to bring in fish to Edgewood-on-the-Lake. It would be like bringing coals to Newcastle. But so far we have had no time to go fishing, and are not likely to have for a few days. Brother M., however, promises to see that we are amply supplied with the best that the lake affords.

We find ourselves here at least a week in advance of the usual time of our arrival. It was with great regret that we were compelled to deny ourselves the pleasure of attending the Missouri State Sunday-school Convention at Plattsburg, as well as to break some other recent engagements. The condition of our health, however, was such as to make these self-denials necessary, and this fact has hastened our departure to the North. We are here, too, in advance of the large body of summer visitors, but the number is increasing daily. Among others present, we notice Prof. Richard B. Moore, of Columbia, Mo., who is here for a week, Brother H. S. Earl and J. S. Hughes. On the first morning after our arrival we are met with a pressing invitation to deliver the address next Lord's Day to the graduating class of the High School at Holland, in old Hope Church. As we are already feeling the invigorating influence of this cooler atmosphere, we hope to be able to render this little service to our neighbors in the good Dutch town of Holland.

A few weeks since, Macatawa Park had a visitor which was not appreciated by those who were present, and as it was the first visit of the kind in the history of the Park, it is sincerely hoped it will be the last. A very severe storm with something of the circular motion of the tornado, struck this region about midnight, leveling a number of large forest trees that were in its immediate pathway, tearing verandas off of some of the houses, blowing in windows of some, and doing other damage, besides greatly terrifying the inhabitants. Edgewood-on-the-Lake, though in the path of the unwelcome visitor, escaped unscathed, though the houses of our neighbors across the road were more or less damaged. The rear veranda of Dr. Everest's cottage was demolished by the blowing down of a tree, which fell across it. Brother Everest had sold his cottage to a resident of St. Louis, and it was unoccupied at the time. We regret that we are not to have Brother Everest and his good wife for neighbors during the coming summer. He was making an increasing number of friends here each year, and we are sure he will be missed from the goodly company of elect spirits who are wont to gather here.

In a little walk through the Park with Mrs. G. last evening, we counted a dozen new cottages which have been erected since we left last season; most of them very handsome and modern. Among these is one built by J. Z. Tyler on our Cedar Walk opposite that of J.J. Haley, which is nearly ready for occupancy. These brethren can hold theological discussions with each other without either leaving his own veranda, and if the versatile brother, who combines a Kentucky pastorate with the editorship of a Chicago weekly gets too far afield in his theology, we can rely upon the Cleveland pastor and manager of the Bethany C. E. Reading Circle to bring him back within the recognized lines of orthodoxy. Together they will be able to hold in check any radical movement that may originate in the neighborhoods of Cincinnati or Lexington.

A SUGGESTION FROM THE EDUCATIONAL POLICY OF THE CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

Thoughtful observers of present movements among the Disciples of Christ are pretty generally agreed that there is a great and growing interest in the cause of education. This interest is not so much in the mere training for the ministry in a superficial knowledge of the Scriptues and of some of the main features of our peculiar teaching, as in the equipment of colleges which can adequately give the broad foundations of a modern education to ministry and laity alike and in the higher education of our preachers and teachers in our own or better institutions for graduate instruction. Increased interest in the endowment of our colleges is indicated by the concession of increased time on our state and national programs for the presentation of educational interests, by the establishment of a regular "Educational Day," by the successful campaigns carried on in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and other states in the interests of their respective colleges. Increased interest in higher professional and special training is manifested by such meetings as that held in St. Louis in April, and by the growing demand, in spite of the attempt to arouse prejudice against them, for our more highly educated men as pastors for our churches.

Encouragement for those who are leading the educational movement, as well as suggestion as to method, may be found in the recent history of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. This church, like our own, began its work with an effort to evangelize a frontier section and found it necessary to employ relatively uneducated men in its ministry. Like ourselves, also, the Cumberland Presbyterians have found the ministerial qualifications of a generation ago inadequate for present needs. The recent general assembly held in Denver devoted more time to the consideration of education than to all other subjects. The most important report considered was that of the committee on education. This denomination has enjoyed great prosperity and now has a large membership. But the Disciples have had a much larger growth. Their membership is found chiefly in a much wealthier section of the country and possesses a fair share of that greater wealth. They are working, too, in a section where general education is further advanced and where modern problems are making greater demands. Under these circumstances, whatever need of educational advance the Cumberland Presbyterians feel, we must feel with greater force; and whatever advance they are able to make we are able to quadruple at least.

The Denver Assembly of the denomination under consideration resolved to enter upon a systematic campaign to raise a million dollars for education. This resolution was adopted unanimously after the leaders of the church had declared that the scheme was perfectly practicable. Furthermore, this action was not to be a mere resolution. An educational commission was established and given large powers; the church was divided into six educational sections, each assigned to the central college of its territory, the authorities of each central college being requested to co-operate with the commission in its territory; the first Sunday of January was made "Educational Day," on which the pastors are urged to read the action of the assembly and preach on "Christian Education;" and, finally, the division of the general fund of $1,000,000 was pledged to seven principal institutions in sums ranging from $300,000 for Cumberland University and Seminary at Lebanon, Tenn., to $50,000 for the Cumberland Divinity House of the University of Chicago. The practical sense of the assembly is shown no less in the attempt to co-ordinate the various denominational institutions and the recognition of the strategic importance of certain leading ones. Then in the establishment of the commission with specific duties. Some of the smaller institutions are urged to cease to pretend to do college work and to articulate themselves with the larger colleges as preparatory schools, "there being much greater need for first-class training schools than for third-rate colleges." Like ourselves, the Cumberland brethren have a number of small institutions which might do admirable work as academies, or even carry students through the first year of college work, but which perpetrate an educational fraud and do their students a gross injustice by claiming to do full college work. The assembly proceeds on sound business and educational principles in proposing to give the bulk of its fund to five of its best managed and best situated institutions, at the same time recognizing the strategic importance of certain new points by pledging a portion to the Chicago work and a portion to a new college to be established on the Pacific Slope.

There is not a single item in the above plan which is not suggestive for us. None depends upon ecclesiastical machinery which we do not possess, nor upon an amount of wealth beyond our reasonable control. It is not too much to ask that our whole brotherhood should give our educational interests such a right of way as the Cumberland Presbyterians have given theirs, nor that our general interest should take in all of our really general institutions and lead to their substantial endowment and support. We, like the denomination above mentioned, must come to realize the primary place of education. In the words of the gentleman who introduced the subject in the Denver Assembly, "Education is the theme of themes, the problem of all problems; all other problems being a part of this. God's command, Go preach, was a command qualified by another, training for the ministry. Thought distinguishes man from the brute, and the thinker is the ruler. This is an age of wealth and of strong colleges, and ours must be endowed if they are to be successful competitors of the others."

Current Religious Thought

Max Nordan, the aggressive and indefatigable leader of the Zionist movement among the Jews, in an article in the June number of the North American Review, on "Israel Among the Nations," says:

I will not stop to consider the absurdity of the objection, that all Jews are liberal. It would be equivalent to the reproach, "All Jews strive to secure school education," or "All Jews avoid drunkenness." But the statement of Eduard von Hartmann is actually false. It is a matter of regret that the Jews do not deserve his reproach, which would in reality be the greatest compliment that could be paid them. The majority of wealthy Jews are not liberal, but conservative, and partly even reactionary; and Eduard von Hartmann knows full well that the two baptized Jews, Leo and Stahl, furnished the ultra-conservative feudal party of Prussia all the historical, philosophical and political thoughts and arguments upon which that party has lived for the past half century, and upon which it lives today. In the same way, it was the baptized Jew, Disraeli, who renewed the program of Tories in England, and secured for that conservative party a new lease of life.

The truth is, that the Jews—with a single exception, which I will presently consider—are nowhere active in Jewish politics. In no country where the Jews enjoy political rights, is there a Jewish vote, in the sense in which the United States has a German or an Irish vote. The Jews who exercise their voting privileges belong entirely to the second category of which I have spoken above, that is, to those who do not wish to be recognized as a distinctive group of the population. They therefore avoid anxiously everything that might call attention to their Judaism. They do not organize; they create no Jewish election committees; they seek to gain no control of campaigns. More than that. Whenever an election is actually in their own hands, they prefer to nominate a Christian, and only occasionally do they seek, in a shamefaced way, to obtain the concession from the party for which they vote, that a Jewish candidate be nominated in a non-Jewish precinct. The East End of London is the only example of which I know, where a Jewish majority has the courage to send a Jew to the House of Commons in a systematic fashion. It frequently happens on the Continent, that Jews vote openly for pronounced anti-Semitists."

The following from the New York Observer on "Thinking and Believing" will bear close reading:

The tuth of the matter is that these great matters of religion cannot be left for soulution to man alone, much less to simply one part of the man; as, for example, the rational faculty. Man alone, as a religionist, unaided by divine revelation, has always been a failure. "Spritual intuitions" have not retrieved large masses of mankind from paganism, conscience has never approved itself as an absolutely dependable guide in all cases. The human reason is greatly subject to prejudice and error, and at the best is beset with insuperable limitations in its search for truth. The faculty of faith, directed toward an authoritative divine revelation needs, then, to be brought into play, that the materials of religion may be found in that revelation, and the reason and conscience may be preserved from wandering off on foolish chases or along forbidden paths.

Between right thought and right belief there canot be a chasm or divergence. But, as man is imperfect in all his powers and processes, a conflict often results between thoughts and beliefs, as these are actually promulgated in the world. We need, then, more men who will think things through. In Christ's command to love the Lord with all the mind the literal translation would be with a thorough mind. The very word "mind" there used, in the Greek, denotes a "thinking through." When men think things through, and not superficially, they will be quite certain, if their spirit be that of humble inquiry after truth, to come out into the clear field and sunny atmosphere of a biblical, evangelical faith, where the wisdom of men is made of none effect, in order that it may be absorbed and glorified in a diviner wisdom. We are not, therefore, disturbed by the so-called antinomies of faith and reason. A self-sufficient human reason, that does not go far enough and does not go straight, may miss the simplicities of the Christian religion, and recoil upon itself at lenth in deepest despair. On the other hand, he who in humble faith accepts God's revelation of himself in the Scriptures, and in the person of his dear Son, will find nothing there that will stultify reason, but everything that conscience will approve.

The Religious World.

The General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Churches, at Denver, decided to raise an endowment fund of $1,000,000 for the endowment of five of their centrally located colleges, and to establish one on the Pacific Coast. This is going about the denominational educational problem in a wise way. The smaller schools will be made feeders to the larger ones.

One of the most interesting incidents in connection with the arranging of the supplies [at the Presbyterian Assembly in Minneapolis recently] was connected with the appointment of the Rev. Dr. C. J. Young, of the Church of the Puritans in New York. Dr. Young had intended to hear one of his brother commissioners preach, but on Saturday morning he heard his name announced as one of the supplies for the following day. He learned also that he was to preach in the Christian Church, or the Church of the Disciples, as it is called There is only one congregation in this city of this denomination, the one to which President Garfield belonged. Dr. Young knew Mr. Garfield well, saw him frequently during his last illness, and conducted his funeral services at Elberon, N. J. It seemed an unusual Providence that brought this warm friend of Garfield's to the church of Garfield's choice, and the sympathetic preacher did not lose the opportunity of the hour, but preached upon the Greatness of Service, using Lincoln and Garfield as illustrations. Without being invidious, it is fair to assume that in the estimation of one congregation in Minneapolis, the most important man in the General Assembly is not the retiring moderator nor the present moderator even, but the man who knew and loved James A. Garfield.—New York Observer.

In writing of religious conditions in Europe in The Illustrated Missionary News for April General Booth says:

We find in every city we occupy (except, perhaps, in some Swedish ones) a vast majority of the population, and we cannot but be struck with the apparent abandonment of these multitudes by the churches. No matter whether "the church of the majority" be Catholic or Protestant, we find its buildings closed as a rule at the hours when the working classes might, if they wished, attend their services. The people are left to the theatre, to the music hall and the cafe, where they find themselves generally in the company of those who worshiped at the church in the morning. And, upon inquiry, one finds that this abandonment of the masses to their indifference or unbelief is rendered the more inevitable by a general want of faith in the saving power of Jesus Christ. In Lent, and sometimes at other seasons, special preaching takes place at many churches, but few seem to hope that this preaching will affect many of those who are actually indifferent. There is a certain class who habitually visit such services annually, and adopt certain religious practices in connection with them; but nobody seems to dream of anything like those general efforts to evangelize the whole population of a city which are so common in this country and in America. The more I reflect upon it, the more this general indisposition to missionize Europe astounds me.

The Catholic Church has in every nation where it once predominated "made itself impossible" for the masses by its meddling with politics and its neglect of the poor. The "Catholic reaction," of which one sometimes hears in France, whatever it may signify, "certainly does not mean the gathering together of more people in the churches."

Reformation of the Nineteenth Century

NINE DECADES OF HISTORY

THE TURBULENT PERIOD—IV.

An Important Crisis Reached.

W. T. MOORE.

WHAT THE PLEA INVOLVED.

This brings us to an important turning-point in our history. As has already been intimated, up to this period we were chiefly engaged in aggressive work with respect to the unconverted and the numerous religious denominations around us. Our plea involved at least three things:

(1) The proclamation of the pure, simple gospel for the conversion of sinners.

(2) The union of these converts (as well as all who acknowledge the one faith and the one baptism) upon the one foundation of apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone.

(3) The scriptural organization, edification and development of the churches of Christ.

During the earlier days of our movement we gave attention mainly to the first two of these divisions, and consequently our organic and spiritual growth was somewhat neglected. But we had now reached a period when this crowning part of our work must receive the most serious consideration. We had evidently come to the parting of the ways. We had advanced a little beyond the first two divisions, and now we must either go backward or forward. To stand still was impossible.

The war had not been an unmixed evil. It had made new conditions for nearly everything. The whole country had entered upon practically a new career. The old methods in either politics or religion would no longer work, and consequently it was a time of readjustment; a time when success could be assured only by recognizing the conditions of society and meeting courageously the obligations which these conditions imposed.

THE LAWS OF PROGRESS.

It is not too much to say that a crisis had been reached in our movement. It was impossible to make progress by many of the old methods, and yet some held on to the old with a tenacity worthy of a better cause. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that these men were necessarily fighting a losing battle. The Disciples were simply following the course of all other movements of their kind, and these are more or less subject to certain laws which may be enumerated as follows:

(1) As soon as a movement becomes strong as an aggressive force, it at once begins to spend part of its strength upon itself rather than upon the world about it. Its aggressive power becomes sensibly weaker in the exact ratio of the intensity of its self-examination. Much of its force is turned inward, and introspection takes the place of the proselyting tendency, which is always characteristic of a new movement.

All religious movements have had to pass through this period, and that of the Disciples cannot claim to be an exception to what is really a general rule. Before the war the whole strength of our movement was largely expended in evangelistic efforts, and in making known the principles for which we contended. But when we came to the period of readjustment and progress, on the lines of new society which the war had produced, we found that we could not any longer work wholly upon the old lines with any hope of permanent success; and yet, there was great apparent danger that in our anxiety to set our house in order we would lose much of the evangelistic fervor which distinguished us during the earlier period of our movement. That there was danger at this point is abundantly proved by subsequent events.

(2) While authoritative definition always has its evils, it is equally true that no definition at all is sometimes not entirely free from difficulty. The anti-creed doctrine of the Disciples was, in some respects, a boomerang. Having no authoritative interpretation of the Scriptures, every man became his own interpreter, and consequently there were times when it was eminently true that in the movement there were "all kinds of doctrine, preached by all kinds of men."

This state of things would necessarily lead to considerable conflict within the body; but a conflict at this point would not likely be precipitated during a period of intensely aggressive work by the Disciples upon the world outside of their own churches. Nor was there much conflict with respect to matters of expediency, wherein definitions had to be considered during the earlier days of the movement.

But when the period of introspection dawned, and the Disciples became deeply interested in their own organization and development, then it was that some of the straightest among us began to feel the reflex force of the anti-creed doctrine which we had so earnestly preached. When brethren began to think for themselves, with respect to church organization, the public worship and missionary societies, then it was that the most intense preachers of the anti-creed crusade began to feel the need of some interpretation of the Bible that would help them to scotch the forward movement which had broken with the absolete methods of the past.

There was really nothing new in the course pursued by the men to whom I have referred. They were only repeating history. Nearly every man has at least three Bibles in his house. One is the printed Bible; another is the man's interpretation of this printed Bible for the regulation of his own conduct, and there is still another interpretation of the first Bible, which is for the regulation of his neighbor's conduct.

It is all very well to say that we take the Bible and the Bible alone as our rule of faith and practice; but in most cases it would help to a clearer understanding of our position if, when we say this, we would at the same time state which Bible it is to which we refer.

(3) Usually the period of a movement which brings with it introspection brings with it also the beginning of intellectual growth. It is the time which marks the dawn of culture and real, substantial progress; and at such a time there is sure to be considerable conflict between the past and the present. Ignorance is always the implacable enemy of legitimate progress. Hence there can be no real forward movement in any religious work without reaching a period where conflict will be surely developed between the two opposing forces to which I have called attention.

As has already been intimated, the war had settled several things. It had at any rate stimulated activity. It had also tended to turn the eyes of the Disciples from their religious neighbors to a careful consideration of their own faith and practice. This introspection, as I have called it, led to an earnest desire on the part of many to make progress somewhat commensurate with the demands of the new conditions of society which had been evolved out of the war. These were called the "progressives."

There were others, however, who refused to accept the changed conditions; or, if they were compelled to accept them, they utterly refused to adapt themselves to these conditions. These men were called the "anti-progressives." Thus, two opposing forces were definitely formed; still, notwithstanding the opposition between them has sometimes been even bitter, like the centripetal and centrifugal forces of nature, these parties have after all contributed to the vigor, growth and harmony of the movement.

It is a great mistake to suppose that opposing forces necessarily bring disaster. In commercial life we do not hesitate to say that competition is the life of trade. It is really the life of everything. Nature teaches us a great lesson on this subject. Where on the globe is it that we find the best developed men and women, both intellectually and physically? Do we look for them at the extreme north or the extreme south? Certainly not. They are found on a narrow belt of the earth, all the way round, just where the seasons are in eternal conflict, just where all the opposing forces of life are most active. The same is true with respect to the moral or religious world. Hence opposition, when legitimately met, is a means of progress.

MORE CASUISTICAL CONTROVERSY.

It is not strange, therefore, that our movement had to pass through the experiences I have indicated; nor is it strange that the conflict precipitated became a formative force in developing the churches in the direction of legitimate growth. It is true that for a time there was a certain amount of danger that the controversies of the period would lead to division. There is always danger in everything that makes for life. Death is the end of all danger. The war itself, as we have already seen, put a heavy strain upon the fellowship of the Disciples North and South, while the communion question affected for a while the convictions of the whole body. Meantime, the organ question was beginning to occupy considerable attention. It was discussed in the A. C. Review, the Millennial Harbinger, Lard's Quarterly and other periodicals of less influence. Such men as Moses E. Lard, A. S. Hayden, Benj. Franklin, John W. McGarvey and Isaac Errett participated more or less in the organ discussion during the period under consideration. These men for the most part wrote temperately, but there was evidently underneath what they said very positive convictions and deep feeling.

Those who opposed the organ discussion, during the period, did so on the ground that it was unscriptural, and consequently they could not worship where it was used. They held that those who advocated its use could have no conscience in the matter, and consequently by the law of love they ought to refuse to do that which wounded their brethren.

But the advocates of the organ contended that their plea was not contrary to Scripture, even if there was no precept or example for the use of the organ in worship. There were some, however, who contended that a legitimate interpretation of the Scriptures readily yields a support to the use of the organ. They also contended that they had a conscience in the matter just as much as their anti-organ brethren; and consequently they felt it to be their duty to contend for the use of it.

The question of the scripturalness of missionary societies had its origin about the same time. It cannot be denied that at the very beginning of the movement Mr. Campbell in his Christian Baptist had laid the foundation for much of the opposition which was now experienced with respect to organized missionary work. But Mr. Campell's writings in the Christian Baptist must be interpreted in the light of the times in which he wrote and the conditions of his environment. When this precaution is taken, Mr. Campbell never wrote anything in opposition to such missionary societies as were proposed by the Disciples. But, however this may have been, it is certain that some excellent and earnest men were bitterly opposed to any such societies as then existed among us and as still exist.

While it is not my purpose, nor does it come within the scope of my part of the work, to follow these discussions through the subsequent periods of the movement, nevertheless, I feel that it would be out of place to close this chapter without remarking that there never has been the slightest chance for anything like a real schism in the body. Of course, there have been individual alienations on account of several differences, but it is certainly a magnificent testimony to the plea for which the Disciples contend that through all the controversies of the past their churches have uniformly maintained their fellowship for one another, and this result is undoubtedly a great victory for intellectual freedom as well as for freedom of action within that whole territory of conduct bounded by what is called expediency.

There is a tradition of an Indian chief who with his tribe fled before the prairie fires till he had crossed a broad river, when he struck his tent-pole into the ground and cried, "Alabama!" (Here we may rest!) He was no prophet. Hostile tribes overpowered them, and they found only graves where they sought a home. This is a parable of the soul; for it earth has no Alabama.—Selected.

SOME PHASES OF THE CHRISTIAN UNION DISCUSSION.*

CHARLES M. SHARPE.

There is no topic of more vital interest among religious people in Protestant Christendom to-day than that of Christian union. The fundamental proposition of Christian politics—"One is your master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren"—is plainly seen to have been contradicted by the rancorous strife and acrimonious competition of past history. The Manchester theory of unrestrained competition, wherein the fittest survive to the highest interests of the social whole, is now quite generally denied within the sphere of economics, and much less can it be admitted within the sphere of religion. Christian thinkers, conceiving, as they do, that Christianity "hath promise of the life that now is as well as of that which is to come," are concerning themselves more and more with practical questions as to how the sad consequences of past error or misfortune are to be avoided in the present and discontinued for the future. Such a question is that of Christian union.

All Christians believe in union. So clearly and decidedly do the Scriptures condemn both the principle and the practice of division, that there is no mistaking their import. But, strange as it may appear, Christians are unable to agree as to what constitutes union in the scriptural sense. The bases of union that have been presented are many and various. The Catholic unionists will maintain as the scriptural basis the supremacy of the Papal See. The Anglican comes forward with his quadrilateral basis, of which the "Historic Episcapate" is the chief corner stone. These both mean by union, ecclesiastical oneness, under one visible authority. Others maintain that scriptural unity does not necessarily mean the consolidation of all religious bodies. It is sufficient that a unity of purpose and spirit shall prevail and shall manifest itself in loving-kindness and cooperation, while the various organizations shall pursue the even tenor of their ways, working out their several diverse destinies. Which of these is the correct view, and if neither, what other alternative presents itself?

In harmony with that most hopeful and decided tendency of modern Christian thought, described as Christo-centric, our appeal shall be to the source of all Chrstian doctrine—the mind of Christ. What did he mean by the union of his followers, and what did his accredited interpreters understand him to mean?

There is no more luminous Scripture upon this point than John 17:20, 21: "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word; that they all my be one as thou, Father, art in me and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." This is our Savior's prayer for all his followers—then and to the end of time. According to his utterance Christian union is the union of his individual followers in a relation similar to that which subsists between Christ and his Father. Without going into the useless and endless discussion of the constitution of the Godhead, suffice it to say that our Savior's language does not invite us to stint the meaning of the union between himself and his Father, but rather to extend it as far as our human conceptions will enable us to do. If any one desires our Savior's comment upon the text under consideration, let him consider the following Scriptures: John 14:10; 15:33; 16:15; 5:19. I feel sure that the intelligent student will discover, from these texts, the union of Christ and his Father to be exclusive of all autonomy of purpose or action as between the two. Independency is a term that has no application to their relation.

Let us now see what the Scriptures teach specifically concerning the union of Christ's disciples.

There is one figure used so frequently bp the Apostle Paul as to suggest that in his view, no better illustration is possible. I refer to all those passages which speak of the church of Christ's body. See 1 Cor. 12:12, 13, 26, 27; Eph. 1:22, 23; Eph. 4:11, 12; Eph. 4:16; Col. 3:15). These passages ought to mean more to us in this age of biological learning than they have meant to those of any former age. The reference is plainly to a living structure—an organism, if you please, in which every individual member is an organ. The union which is said to subsist between them is certainly organic union. To the Church of Christ, scripturally described as his body, biological conceptions will undoubtedly apply.

The figure of a building is also generally employed to describe the church. "Upon this rock," said Jesus, "I will build my church." "For other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." Whatever is meant by architectural unity, then, may be ascribed to the Church of Christ scripturally described as a building. That the church is one appears from the fact that only one foundation is or can be laid.

Summarizing, now, our conclusions from the three classes of Scripture examined, we see that Christian union to the mind of Christ and his apostles meant the union of his individual disciples in a fellowship as complete as human thought can conceive. That union is formally described by the figure of a living organism, in which the impairment of one organ is to some extent the impairment of all, in which the individual organs perform special functions subservient to the interests of the whole, while they in turn are nourished by the common current of life coursing throughout the entire organism. This unity is further illustrated by a building, built upon one foundation, and in which all the parts are mutually related and interdependent.

How closely does the present condition of the church conform to the scriptural ideal? Are we as individual followers of Christ "one as he and his Father are one?" Is the Church of Christ as it exists in sectarian Christendom "one body," or many?

To the first query answer will be made, and justly, too, that such oneness as is indicated between Jesus and the Father must for us imperfect men be merely an ideal. We can only realize that oneness in proportion as we conquer the flesh and develop divine likeness. So said Paul to the Corinthians. Division is always evidence of carnality, and individual progress in divine things tends toward the completest union among those in whom spiritual life is dominant.

*Read before the Ministers' Union, at Lawrence, Kansas.

To the second question—"Is the Church of Christ one body?"—I suppose no one will venture an affirmative reply. Such a position is clearly indefensible in view of the Scriptures cited. The condition of the Christian world to-day is one of visible disunion. Says Dr. Amory H. Bradford (Biblical World Vol. XIII, p. 86), "Instead of clasping hands in common fellowship and moving as an army, united and resistless, we are divided into rival camps."

Our discussion has now developed the scriptural idea of union and has shown that the sectarian condition of the church does not answer to the demands of the scriptural ideal. We now inquire what may be done to alleviate the unfortunate condition that obtains. For purposes of discussion I will put forth two propositions.

First, the Scriptures do not contemplate a consolidation of denominations as such. All scriptural teaching concerning union refers to individuals and never to collectivities. Collectivities are never mentioned except, as in the one case of the Corinthian factions, to be immediately condemned and negated. A collectivity within, and other than the universal Christian brotherhood, is nowhere in the NewTestament Scriptures accorded any ligitimate status whatsoever. The organic unity of the body of Christ as indicate, in the Scriptures could not possibly be realized by a union of religious bodies in which the identity of those bodies should be preserved any more than the divisions of the Corinthian church could have been healed by a compromise in which the claims of Apollosites, Kephasites and Paulites should have been severally recognized. In the solution of that difficulty the only right accorded to the factions was the right of dissolution. As it seems plain that the Scriptures do not recognize the existence of sects, not even for purposes of union, so also does it seem clear that denominations could not, in virtue of origin or history, however honorable, acquire any indefeasible right of permanent existence. I cheerfully accord to the chief Protestant bodies, with possibly a single exception, an honorable origin and acknowledge, with certain reservations, that they have had an honorable history. The origin of Protestant denominations was justified by the corruption and tyranny of the Romish Church, which could not be reformed from within. Their continuance was justified so long as they had to fight for religious liberty and purity of faith as against the papal power or other oppressive ecclesiasticisms, and so long as their peculiar organization furnished the indespensable bulwarks against the foe. Their persistence is no longer justifiable unless it can be shown that the interests of Christ's kingdom are to be thereby promoted,and not only so, but more fully promoted than would otherwise be possible. Can this be shown? Not if we are to believe Richard Baxter, who wrote: "The gospel cannot accomplish its great triumph and collect the redeemed from every land until the law of Christ be fulfilled by these Protestant sects—until they become one." Not if we are to believe Dr. Howard Crosby's words, that "there can be no millennium for a divided church." Not if we are to credit the rising and increasing chorus of voices from all religious bodies, condemning in decisive terms the divided conditon of the Church of Christ and urging union as the indispensable preliminary of a successful evangelism.

At this point comes forward the advocate of spiritual unity and urges that such unity is not incompatible with separate and autonomous organizations. We will summon him to justify his position by the Scriptures. Under which of the scriptural illustrations will denominationalism find place? Is it a building, built upon one foundation, and do the various parts of denominational Christendom mutually support each other? What support does Methodism derive from the Baptist body? Does Presbyterianism regard Episcopacy as a necessary adjunct to its own prosperity and perpetuity? I beg that some one of vivid imagination and some skill in draughting will present to our eyes a form of architecture corresponding to denominationalism. Can denominationalism find place under the figure of one organic body, in which if one member suffers all the rest suffer with it? What paroxysms of pain would the Methodist body experience by the dissolution or atrophy of Presbyterianism? Merely to ask these questions is to expose the absurdity of the position which provokes them.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

W. REMFREY HUNT.

The greatest sermon-story in the whole world of literature is the Acts of the Apostles. It is the continuation of Luke's history of the life and times of the Christ. It is the great missionary manual of the Christian Church. Its author was a missionary to the Gentiles. From the incidental references to himself in the Acts we find Luke as the companion to the great Asian missionary. Paul speaks of him as the "beloved physician." He was also traveler, preacher, author, teacher. His gospel declares what Jesus "began both to do and to teach." The Acts records what Christ—under the dispensation of the Holy Spirit—continues "to do and to teach" unto all nations.

This fundamental law of continuity must be maintained. The light-rays of revelation and inspiration are not yet gone out. We must continue our labors in the acquisitiom of truth. We shall become strong and influential in the respective ratio of our adaptation to the laws of growth and the needs of the age. Our name and character as an unsectarian body is "to be continued." Our great missionary enterprises demand that we write the twenty-ninth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles.

The eternal purpose is that the unsearchable riches of Christ is to be preached unto all nations. Anything less than this is a caricature on the Christian faith, a travesty on our commission and a burlesque on our destiny. In the wonderful purpose of God the manifold wisdom was to be made known to the sons of men "through the church." This is the revelation of the mystery which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord. This also is the interpretation, exposition and expansion of the great commision. Here is grace abounding. The Word is preached, not merely to the home races of Judea. The "other sheep" is now being sought. The "far-off" made nigh. The "alien" made a fellow heir. The "stranger" made a fellow citizen and the redeemed heathen made welcome in the household of God.

Mark the promise of Christ: "And ye shall receive power when the Holy Spirit is come upon you, and ye shall be my witnesses both in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria and to the uttermost part of the earth." This was the text of the divine charter and commission of the church. The royal command like the beneficent promise of the presence always is given in perpetuity. The work and the Word is to be continued.

We are not satisfied with past achievements. It is but the index of the other chapter. We must go on, grow up and work out in the great mission entrusted to us. With an invincible plea, a clean record, free of the ivy growth of creedal accretions and with the vigor of youth on our side we shall yet surprise the labeled segments of Christendom with our strength, hopefulness and continual victories.

The tide of missionary interest in both the home and over-the-sea fields is steadily rising. It is overcoming the barriers which at one time seemed insuperable. At last the Christian Church is girding itself in earnest. The work of Carey, Morrison, Moffat, Judson, Nevins, Saw, Henderson, Biddle, Garst and others is "to be continued;" indeed, it is being continued all along the line.

The latest edition of our missionary history predicts a new era in the art of giving. We must continue to do even more than we did at the March offering. Surely, we have passed the line where our members give only a cent a month apiece. If we could enlist this year the 4,300 churches of our brotherhood who have dis-continued to discharge the obligations of their Christian name and faith, the society could redouble its energies, those churches would be abundantly blessed, their life enlarged and their future made to gleam bright with promise.

It is imperative that we "continue in the grace of God" in this outgrowth as a great missionary people. Never were our opportunities greater. We have more colleges and schools to meet the demands of our mission fields than ever before. Our youth are pouring out and into all parts of the newly created empires of the world. Christian nations are in the ascendant. The supremacy of our race is seen in the marvelous acquisition by our youth of the foreign languages, they can live in any climate, master any difficulties and laugh at impossibilities as they cry in the name of King Jesus, Excelsior!

It is paramount in importantance that we continue to supply men and means. It is supreme in urgency that we continue in prayer for those who have gone forth. It is vital that we remember the divine promise of the Holy Spirit was given conditionally and only as we continue to "go" or "send." Let us, therefore, see to it that the resolutions of Chattanooga become the achievements of the year.

The indomitable energy, self-sacrifice and whole-hearted service for the raising of the $150,000 for FOREIGN MISSIONS then is to be continued!

The persistent prayerfulness, untiring conservation and active faith for the raising of the collection for HOME MISSIONS must be continued!!

The co-operation, sympathies and well-directed canvassing for the fruitfulness of the CHILDREN'S DAY shall be continued!!!

The joyous, free and willing partnership in the helping of the success of the C. W. B. M. and the CHURCH EXTENSION DAYS, also, if we are Disciples indeed, WILL BE CONTINUED.

Our Budget.

—Are you having the heat and the burden of the day?

—Our reporter's report of the Plattsburg convention has not reached us in time for this paper.

—We give our readers a picture of our lamented brother, F. M. Bruner, this week and a tribute to his memory by W. S. Errett. As his life has been outlined by those who have written of him since his death, we need not add to what has been said now and here.

—Baxter Waters, the supply pastor of the Central Christian Church, this city, on last Sunday was honored by the presence of a distinguished visitor in his morning audience, Col. William Jennings Bryan. Col. Bryan had been at the funeral of Richard P. Bland, Lebanon, Mo., the previous day and spent Sunday in St. Louis.

—We acknowledge the receipt of a copy of a book entitled Experimental Study of Children, including Anthropometrical and Psycho-physical measurements of Washington school children in United States and Europe, description of instruments of precision in the laboratory of the Bureau of Education, child-study in the United States, and a bibliography, by Arthur MacDonald, specialist in the Bureau of Education. This book represents a vast amount of research and labor. It is published by the government printing office.

—Notwithstanding a rain at the marriage hour, the Mt. Cabanne Christian Church, this city, was crowded to witness the nuptials of Mr. Daniel Silver and Miss Daisy Call. The decorations, the music by Mr. Gettys, and the ceremony by the pastor, Dr. Dungan, were all in the happiest vein and a delight to the eye and ear of the splendid audience gathered in honor of the widely known and highly esteemed bride and bridegroom. On the same evening the bridal party started on to the lakes, the best wishes of all their friends, both present and absent, going with them. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST joins in congratulations.

—The assistant editor of this paper recently enjoyed the pleasure of preaching on two Lord's days to the Fifth Christian Church of this city. The pastor, W. F. Hamann, his wife and son, were absent on a vacation of nearly three weeks. The church is a live one; good Bible-school, good Endeavor Society and good audiences. The Endeavorers of this church are supporting a mission Bible-school with an attendence of over 100 scholars. Ye assistant editor also preached two sermons to the Beulah Christian Church of this city, Sunday, June 11th, and found an excellent Bible-school and a good Endeavor Society. They are also good hearers of the Word. The Beulah Church is still without a pastor, but in correspondence with a preacher whom they hope to secure soon.

—A. J. Marshall, the evangelist of this city, made a fine report of his commencement in South St. Louis. He is getting the Carondelet Christian Church well organized for effectual work. There were eight additions for the first month with a marked growth in the attendance of the various activities of the church. The outlook is a very hopeful one for the permanency of the church. Steps will probably be taken soon to purchase a lot and in time to build a house. Bro. Marshall's family is now with him and he feels more comfortably situated and reinforced in his work. He is now assisting O. A. Bartholomew, the pastor of the West End Christian Church, this city, in a protracted meeting. There had been one confession on the third night of the meeting with indications of others accepting Christ. Bro. Marshall is making a good impresion upon the preachers of this city by his careful, practical way of going about a great work.

—The 42nd announcement of Christian University, Canton, Mo., breathes forth a spirit of hopefulness that is exceedingly pleasing to its friends. A strong faculty and full courses of study in the different departments of the University for the year 1899-1900 are announced.

—We received a telegram from John L. Brandt, pastor of the church at Valparaiso, Ind., on the 14th inst., announcing the death of their baby, Raymond Dewey, on the previous night. The message came too late for notice in our last issue. The child was 14 months old. The sorrowing parents have our sympathy.

—In speaking of those who are criticising Dr. Hillis, the new pastor of Plymouth Church, for finding his sermons, texts or themes from some of the world's great authors, the Cumberland Presbyterian asks the following pertinent question: "Is it not about as well to take a secular text and preach from it a religious sermon as to take a Bible text and, departing from it, as some do, as far as the east is from the west, preach a secular sermon?"

—The Journal and Messenger gently hints at error in the Baptist fold in the following statement: "Our church-succession brethren are very sure that 'John's baptism was Christian baptism,' but they do not stop to think how his practice harmonizes, or fails to harmonize, with their theory of the ordinance." And in case "his practice fails to harmonize with their theory of the ordinance" we wonder what will become of their theory of the origin of the Baptist Church?

—C. S. Medbury, pastor of the Christian Church at Angola, Ind., has published a tract of 20 pages, envelope size, paper cover, entitled "Fundamental Lessons in the Plan of Salvation," that has the promise of great usefulness. There are ten lessons on leading biblical topics arranged in questions and answers on each theme. The answers for the most part are simply the scriptural reference where the answer in scriptural language may be found. It is the kind of a catechism that if studied by our children would not only show them the way to Christ, but store their minds with useful knowledge on religious and biblical questions of the greatest moment. We anticipate a wide demand for this tract because of its simple-practical way of dealing with religious questions and responsibilities.

—Receipts to the American Christian Missionary Society for the week ending June 17, 1899, were $1,944.93, being a gain of $1,170.13 over the corresponding week last year. The number of new churches contributing this week is 46. It is thought that a large number of churches have delayed sending their offerings to secure larger amounts. The board urges that all churches send all or a part of their offerings at once if possible. They have obligations that are maturing that must be met and a large number of appeals for help that cannot be answered until they know certainly what the offering is going to be. Please remit promptly all money for Home Missions to Benj. L. Smith, Cor. Sec., Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, O.

—The New Voice for June 10th gives a new version of the motive leading John Wilkes Booth to assassinate President Lincoln. According to the story related in the Voice the assassination resulted from the failure of an effort on the part of Booth to secure from President Lincoln the pardon of his friend, John Young Beall, who was under sentence of death as a Confederate guerrilla and spy. John Yonng Beall had joined the Confederate navy, but operated upon the lakes and by raids in New York. After his capture he was tried and ably defended, but sentenced to be executed in February, 1865. Booth is said to have worked hard for the life and release of his friend, visiting the President in his behalf; but failing to secure his pardon he declared to avenge his blood by killing both Lincoln and Seward. The Voice gets this story from the late Dr. Geo. A. Foote, who recently died at Warrenton, N. C. The story is told in a very plausible way, but as yet seems to lack confirmation other than the guaranteed veracity of Dr. Foote. If true it removes the foundation for an opinion injurious to the South that has been generally accepted by the people who opposed the rebellion.

—Another indication of the dying condition of the sectarian spirit in the religious bodies of this age was made manifest in this city last week in the following incident: Rabbi Sale and the board tendered their temple, Shaare Emeth, free of charge, to the Church of the Redeemer, Episcopal, for an organ recital by Charles Galloway, for the benefit of the debt upon that church. This is said to be "the first time in the history of this city where a Hebrew congregation ever loaned its place of worship to make money for a Christian Church."

—The January and February number of Business in Christianity is largely occupied with an account of the saving of the church at Huntington, W. Va., which was saved from the sheriff's hammer by the Church Extension Board. In this we have a practical demonstration of the usefulness and efficiency of this arm of missionary activity in our work as a religious body. By the way, do you take this magazine? It is the organ of our Church Extension Board, and keeps its readers informed on Church Extension work.

—St. Louis now has "a new nonsectarian church." The failure of the church authorities to settle a difficulty in the Tyler Place M. E. Church, of this city, resulted in the withdrawal of its pastor, Rev. Abraham E. Nelson, and a portion of his flock, and the establishment of a so-called "nonsectarian church." We do not know what the articles of faith of this new church will be, but presume that Methodist characteristics in faith and practice will still prevail. Mr. Nelson is reported as saying that the movement was entirely orthodox in that its advocates do not desire either to defeat or defend denominational preponderance, laying stress only on the great essentials of the Christian religion. He also said that they believe in the unity of church and in the unification of orthodox Christianity. Whether the now two "nonsectarian" churches of this city will fraternize we know not, but predict in the negative. A truly nonsectarian church is a difficult thing to produce in the world, even yet.

—In an interesting article in a recent number of the American Tribune, Indianapolis, Ind., on "Dixie's Land," J. Fraise Richard, Washington, D. C., corrects the long-conceived and widespread error as to the origin of "Dixie." Instead of its being a Southern song in its origin he says it was composed April 5, 1859, in the city of New York for the Bryant Minstrels, by Daniel Decatur Emmett, a native and now a resident of Mount Vernon, Ohio. It originated, as will be seen by the dates, two years prior to the breaking out of the Civil War, in response to the request of Jerry Bryant, the senion member of the troupe, made on Saturday evening, that Mr. Emmett should present at the rehearsal on the Monday following a "hooray" for the public. Mr. Emmett responded that the time was short in which to compose such a production; but being urged he set earnestly at work, and on the Sunday intervening he composed both the words and the music of "Dixie," and presented them on Monday in the form in which they are now sung. In the same article the writer gives an interesting sketch of the author of Dixie, who still lives in a small house near Mt. Vernon, Ohio. He is 83 years old, has no children and is dependent upon charity for his subsistence. We agree with Bro. Richard, that "the writers of our sacred and patriotic songs should not be neglected nor forgotten."

—On last Sunday the assistant editor of this paper dedicated a new house of worship in Williamson County, Ill., known as the West Christian Chapel. This house is about eight miles east of Carbondale. It is a neat frame building, seating about 300 people, and by contract, would have cost from ten to twelve hundred dollars. But it was built largely by the members and friends of the congregation and cost much less. There was only $170 remaining to be paid at the time of dedication. The brethren of this church, anticipating a larger audience than could get in the house, many times over, had prepared seats in a beautiful grove near the church where all the services of the day were held. There were brethren and friends present from Carbondale, Carterville, Marion, Johnson City and all the intervening country. It was an old-fashioned enjoyable "basket meeting." The communion service in the afternoon was conducted by Bro. Page, pastor of the church at Carterville, and the Carterville choir furnished excellent music for the afternoon services. The West Christian Chapel church is small, there being but about 20 members, but they are active workers and mean to build up a strong church in that community. All enjoyed the day. The West Christian Chapel choir sang beautifully at the morning service besides leading the entire congregation in some of the "good old songs." One of the most widely known men of this community is Dr. Hayton, now in his 83rd year, and still in the practice of medicine. He is as agile as a man of 60 years, writes a fine, steady hand, and has the promise of becoming a centenarian. He is a remarkably well-preserved man for his years. The West Christian Chapel is in the midst of a good farming district and an intelligent, prosperous community. The writer enjoyed the hospitality of Bro. Clark, of Carbondale, Sunday night, and was back at his office at usual hour for work on Monday morning, having had a pleasant outing and the satisfaction of having tried to do some good for others while away.

—The St. Louis Christian Advocate reprints in full the recent editorial in this paper on "Union of Temperance Forces" and its editor, W. B. Palmore, one of the leading temperance workers of the country, adds the following comment:

We are very glad indeed that such able editors as Dr. Garrison are opening their eyes to the greatest enemy of our republic. Agitation and co-operation is the greatest need of the hour. For local organization we would suggest the Rochester (New York) movement: The Prohibition Union of Christian men, or the American Anti-saloon League. The former can be federated in the latter. The American Anti-saloon League will receive or co-operate with every and any one who is ready and practically opposed to the saloon, regardless of creed, color, politics or religion. Organized iniquity must be met by organized righteousness. And we would be very glad to have Dr. Garrison and all his great church to fall in with the American Anti-saloon League, or to suggest something better.

Will some one of our correspondents who is familiar with the aim and methods of "The American Anti-saloon League" tell us about it, and how those who are opposed to the saloon may co-operate in putting it down? From what we know of it, we can see no reason why all the friends of temperance may not unite in opposing the saloon. This need not hinder them from adopting or using any other method of opposing the liquor traffic. As to the "opening of eyes" to this great evil, the editor of this paper has been trying to open his for more than a quarter of a century, and he is ready to open them still wider. May he be able to bear the light.

—A special dispatch to the Globe-Democrat, this city, June 16th, from Richmond, Va., says that C. E. Morgan, pastor of the Christian Church, Minneapolis, Minn., has accepted the call extended to him from the Seventh St. Christian Church of that city, to become its pastor. The time of his departure from Minneapolis has not been fixed. Bro. Morgan had a call from the Central Christian Church of this city to succeed F. G. Tyrrell, and the impression went out that he would probably accept, but it seems that he has decided in favor of Richmond, Va. If Bro. Morgan goes to Richmond, St. Louis will not complain against him nor the Richmond church, but nevertheless would have been glad to have secured him for this field.

—The state convention of Texas, at Ft. Worth, appointed a committee of six preachers to canvass the state to raise the amount necessary to save Add-Ran University to our people. The time in which to make the canvass is limited to 30 days and if the amount necessary to meet certain debts be not raised in that time the school will pass to other hands. The brotherhood at large in general and of Texas in particular, are appealed to for assistance in saving the university to our people. Any donations may be sent to Chancellor Buxton, at Waco, Tex., who will remain at Waco to report the progress of the canvass authorized by the convention. The canvassers are preachers and their time will be donated by the churches for which they preach for 30 days for this work.

—We have received a number of addresses, all excellent in their literary caste, force of thought and grasp of essentials, which will be published as fast as our space will permit. They will make excellent summer reading for those who at this season have the time for more extended and intellectually invigorating articles even of the heavier sort.

—The yearbook of the Y. M. C. A. of North America for the year 1899 contains a lengthy report of their work in the army and navy and altogether makes a book about 250 pages. There are a goodly number of half tone pictures of different Y. M. C. A. buildings, gymnasiums, army scenes and Y. M. C. A. workers. This report is published by the international committee, New York City, N. Y., where copies may be obtained.

—The Chicago Record of recent date somewhat sharply rebukes the officials of the navy department at Washington for keeping alive the Schley-Sampson controversy. It thinks that the agitation of the things at issue between these two naval commanders is the result of partisans striving to increase the glory of their hero, each at the expense of the other, and blames the authorities at Washington for giving ear to their talk. On the merits of the controversy the Record well says:

No conceivable good could be secured now by a secret inquiry into Schley's instructions to officers of the Brooklyn during the engagement. The fact that Schley's ship was in the forefront of battle throughout answers all imputations that he had any reluctance to meet the enemy. The only result of an inquiry would be to stir up further recriminations into which not only the friends of the two rear-admirals, but the captains and other officers would be drawn. The controversy has been deplorable from the beginning, as the one blemish upon a great naval triumph. Let the matter be dropped now before it has attracted more of the world's attention and becomes a discredit and scandal.

And so we say with the Record, "Let the controversy cease."

—The increasing population of Seattle, Wash., among whom are many Disciples of Christ, has led the church there to undertake the establishment of one or two more churches at once in that city. To this end they have called R. E. Dunlap to return to them again from the East to undertake this work. They have also asked the co-operation of the churches east of the Rocky Mountains in this essentially important work. Brother and Sister Dunlap's work in Seattle and elsewhere in Washington has been so important and so satisfactory that these brethren feel that they must entrust this new movement to their wise management, and they therefore urge all other churches to "keep their hands off of them" for pastoral or evangelistic work; but to assist the work through them all that it is in their power to do. The former work of these two faithful servants of the Master is presented in the highest praise in a communication recently received at this office from John B. Gordon. We ourselves also have the utmost confidence in the consecrated heart and work of Bro. and Sister Dunlap and trust that this call is from the Lord and to a wider and greater work in this important part of his vineyard.

—We have a letter in our care for Emma D. Andrews, and one for T. Elmore Lucey. Will these parties please send post office address? and the letters will be forwarded.

—The catalogue of the University of Missouri for 1899 contains 218 pages of closely printed matter relating to its condition and outlook. One feature of this report worthy of special attention is the strong appeal made by ex-Gov. Stone and Gov. Stevens for a larger endowment and for increased revenues. It is desirable that the university of the great state of Missouri have every equipment and advantage possessed by the best university of any state in the Union.

—R. B. Neal, of Grayson, Ky., has issued tract number 4 of his anti-Mormon series. This tract is entitled "Smithianity, or Mormonism Refuted by Mormons," part second, and is accompanied with an introduction by Prof. I. B. Grubbs, of the Bible College, Lexington, Ky., strongly endorsing the tract. He also calls upon all to assist Bro. Neal in this work by profusly scattering his anti-Mormon tracts wherever they have a hold upon or in any community, or wherever persons are in danger of falling under the influence of "this miserable fraud and delusive invention." We published part of an article from Bro. Neal last week, the rest to follow soon, that greatly strengthens the positions taken in these tracts. There seems to be no doubt that his quotations from Mormon writers will stand the test, and our people need not fear to use them.

—In order to success as a preacher it is necessary to accentuate what might be termed the three vs—virtue, vision and voice. A man's virtuous character is at the foundation of all effective work as a preacher. A man can preach no better than he is. Vision, however, must supplement virtue if a man is broadly to influence his fellows for God and a higher life. The life that has no vista, the pulpiteer who is no seer, the orator who is not a prophet, can never open up the things of God so that men will be led to exclaim, We must see these things too, we must catch this spirit, we must have this heavenly blessing. But even the virtuous man of vision may fail of much practical influence as a speaker unless he has also voice, or the physical power to project his thoughts to the remotest part of the auditorium and to drive the meaning home to the innermost depts of the consciousness of the dullest hearer. The gift of a superb voice is not given to all, but the voice of almost any man can be trained by hard work to do far better work than is at present being accomplished. It is a pity that a good man with a bright heavenly vision should ever fail for want of vocal power from being a public force for righteousness among the men of his own generation.—New York Observer.

Dr. W. T. Moore in Texas.

The University of Texas turned over all the baccalaureate services this year to the Christian Church. Dr. Moore was selected to deliver the sermon. He attended our state convention at Ft. Worth and came with us to Austin. We were delighted to have Bro. Moore in our home and enjoyed his visit very much. His discourse was considered one of the very finest ever delivered at the University of Texas. Pres. Winston was much pleased with it. The Austin Statesman thus speaks of Dr. Moore's effort: "The sermon of Dr. W. T. Moore, Dean of the Bible College of Columbia, Mo., was a gem. It was listened to with rapt attention by every one in the large assemblage. Dr. Moore is a pleasing speaker and delivered his sermon with excellent elocutionary ability. He chose as his subject, 'Jesus as a Teacher,' and in addressing himself to this subject stated that in establishing his kingdom, Jesus practically slapped in the face all the methods of the world."

Austin, Tex. J. W. LOWBER.

Francis M. Bruner, LL. D.

Throughout the ages past tributes truly eloquent and just have been written to the memory of men who stood high among their fellows—trbutes to scholarship and statesmanship, to genius in the arts, in inventons, in scientific research and in warfare; but how inadequate are the powers of man truly and justly to estimate and express the inner life of his fellow—the purposes and workings of the heart rather than of the head; of that force which prompts to and manifests itself in a life of heroic struggle and self-denial for the moral uplift of humanity, the extension of the kingdom of truth and righteousness and the salvation of the race. Hence, while I feel that it is due to the memory of Pres. Bruner that something of the spirit and aim of his life work as I know is, but as it is not known to the brotherhood generally, should be written, I attempt to do so with much diffidence.

I write, therefore, not of the scholar, the teacher and preacher, as such, but of his work as it reveals the spirit of the man—his motives and aims, and as it became known to me in intimate association with him during some of the very laborious and trying years of his life.

I met him first in Bloomington, Ill., in 1880, I think, at a preacher's meeting. He was the choice of a committee sent from the church at Greenville, Ill., where I was preaching, to select a man to hold a meeting for them. He came, and for a month or more preached with great earnestness, clearness and force, and urged obedience to the commands of the Christ. The result was disappointing; the people did not come to hear him and the number added was small, dispite the powerful preaching. He felt keenly the lack of interest and the seemingly failure of his efforts, yet labored on uncomplaining and hopeful; the causes lay elsewhere. He was too manly to resort to sensational methods, either in the pulpit or among the people. He was too loyal to his Master and too conscientious in the discharge of duty to cater to the desire for mere entertainment, to serve up to perishing souls the froth of funny anecdote, of startling recital or a wishy-washy something called popular preaching instead of the clear, simple and convincing Word of Truth as it is in Jesus Christ.

Later on, at his solicitation, I removed my family to Abingdon and engaged with him in the work in Abingdon College. For sometime he had been struggling with the difficult problem of overcoming the unfavorable and obstructing influences and conditions resulting from an unfortunate trouble of years agone in the faculty and in the church, and which led to a division of the body. There was still prevalent (in the town) a feeling of distrust and indifference, and a lack of confidence and therefore of active interest on the part of the brotherhood and former patrons nonresident. Nevertheless, with unswerving purpose and untiring diligence he gave himself to the work of removing the obstructions, reorganizing the forces and unifying the influences by which she should become again what she once had been, an efficient factor in the cause of Christian education; opposed by some, cooly ignored by others, and heartily aided and encouraged by but a few, even among those whose material interests as well as their relation to the work would seem to have led them to give him support, he faltered not, and for three years more he continued the struggle. Doing a full measure of the work in the classroom through the sessions, traveling to preach, lecture and solicit patronage as opportunity came, getting for his labor and expenses a pro-rata portion of tuitions—a mere pittance, and getting nothing from the amount involved in the college property, and yet, moving steadily forward, uncomplaining, hopeful, prayerful, vigilant and untiring, although greatly afflicted in body, he sought to lift Abingdon College out of the wreck of an ugly and damaging strife of many years' duration and start her anew on a career of usefulness and honor. And yet, who can tell what all this truly involved—how much it measures of anxious thought, of doubts and questionings and heartaches, of sleepless nights, with throbbing brain and aching limb, and through it all, of a faith that though it wavered (and well it might) yielded not; how much it measures of all that goes to reveal a spirit of heroic self-sacrifice, of all that characterizes the man of lofty ideals, worthy aims, great gifts of mind and heart, and of noble and heroic endeavor.

Deeply impressed with the facts that the division in the church was a great barrier to successful work in the college and in the church, he hesitated not to assume the additional burden of an effort to bring about a reconciliation and a united church. Earnestly and persistently, yet with tact and kindness, he pressed the matter upon the thought and consciences of the brethren until the victory was won. With a few exceptions the entire membership of the church came together, determined to leave all past differences behind and live and labor together as brethren. To Pres. Bruner's faithful and self-sacrificing efforts was largely due the successful accomplishment of this reunited body—a work not the least in its importance among those to which the best efforts of his mind and heart were given in his loyal devotion to the Master. The church in Abingdom is a vigorous and growing body, but the college was closed in 1884, and merged in Eureka. It proved a forlorn hope to Pres. Bruner, but fhe seed he sowed and the infinence he exerted upon many young and plastic minds during those years will bear a rich fruitage whose value no man can estimate.

Of few men, I think, may it be more truly said, He sought not for glory from men, but he sought for the glcry that cometh from God. To most persons he seemed to have, in manner and method, less of the suaviter in modo and more of the fortiter in re. His aim was to help rather than to please. He relied upon truth as the corrector of error, and he did not combat wrong with gloved hands. He might have had a softer touch and a smoother method, perhaps, if he had been cast in a less rugged mold and of less stern stuff.

Many there are less profound in research, less able in scholarship, less loyal to the truth and in the service they have rendered to humanity less efficient, less worthy than he, who are more widely known and have a higher place in the public estimation than has he; but He whom he served and who alone knows what is in the heart of man, knows, and the reward is sure. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord * * * * . W. S. Errett.

New Castle, Wyo., May 22, 1899.

The Helping Hand, by W. W. Dowling, is a manual of instruction for the Y. P. S. C. E., that great movement of the century that is putting new life into our churches, by interesting the young, causing them to flock to the Lord's house "as doves to the windows," and encouraging them earnestly in the Lord's work. It contains, in the most condensed form, full information concerning the Y. P. S. C. E. movement, with instructions and suggestions concerning every point. This work has had a more extensive circulation, and proved more helpful to Endeavor workers than any other hand-book published. 25 cents. Christian Pub. Co. St. Louis.

PERSONAL MENTION.

E. M. Norton, late pastor of the church at Rossville, Ill., is now located at Lynxville, Wis.

F. W. Multchler, of Footville, Wis., delivered the Memorial Day address for the people of that city.

Mrs. M. C. Springgate, of Wichita, Kan., writes us that her father, H. C. M. Keefer, departed this life in April last.

D. W. Hastings preached the memorial sermon at Drakeville, Ia., where he has entered upon his eighth year's ministry.

Prof. John Shackleford and wife, of Lexington, Ky., have gone to Tacoma, Wash., where they will remain indefinitely.

G. L. Wharton and family have reached home from India. Their present address is 202 Horton Ave., Detroit, Mich.

H. K. Coleson, manager of Our Plea, till it became defunct, is now located at New Albany, Miss., preaching for churches in that region.

F. D. Power, of Washington, D. C., delivered the baccalaureate sermon for Kentucky University. Theme: "The Mastery of Jesus."

Doctor A. C. Foster, of Blue Mound, Ill., wishes to know the address of J. B. Allen, once the pastor of the Christian Church in Springfield, Ill.

W. C. Morro, pastor of the Lygon Street Christian Church, Melbourne, Australia, reports the work there in an encouraging condition.

Dr. H. L. Willett, Dean Disciples' Divinity House, University of Chicago, recenely preached for his brother, A. F. Willett, the pastor of the church at Richland Center, Wis.

Bro. M. H. Armor, of Aberdeen, Miss., delivered the address of welcome on behalf of the honorary members of the sixteenth annual convention of the W. C. T. U., of Mississippi, recently in session in his own town.

A. M. Harral, formerly of Piedmont, but now at Farmington, Mo., recently called at this office. He is in a field where there is great need for more laborers, and we hope to hear of good success attending his ministry.

R. M. Marshall has closed his work at Belle Vernon, Pa. The brethren and many friends express regret at his departure and they recommend him to any church desiring "a fearless expounder of the gospel."

A preacher of more than twenty years' successful experience desires to hold a meeting in tent or otherwise, or permanent work. He can furnish highest testimonials. Address J. Grinstead, care C. L. Thurgood, 1931 Fifth Avenue, Pittsburg, Pa.

T. N. Kincaid, Hot Springs, Ark., wants a good singer to assist in a meeting in October and instruct in song music—one who wishes to spend a month in the Springs for health, and is willing to do so for entertainment and one-half of the freewill offering.

C. C. Davis, pastor of the church at Davenport, Ia., has added to his work the care of a local paper It is called the Harbinger and to appear weekly. Though small it is newsy. From it we learn that the pastor editor is to be honored with the presence of the High School graduating class and the preaching of the baccalaureate sermon in the Christian Church, June 25th.

E. M. Smith, late pastor Beulah Christian Church, this city, writes us that he is enjoying a rest at Vigor, Va., and hopes to be ready for vigorous work for some church by the close of the summer. Any church on the lookout for a good preacher would do well to write him at his summer resort in Virginia.

J. A, Harris, of Ft. Wayne, Ind., will soon close his work with the West Creighton Church, and desires evangelistic work for a season. He says that he can furnish a fine leader of song to assist, where desired, and also song books. Churches wanting a meeting are requested to address him at 46 Hurstis Ave., above city.

I. N. McCash delivered the memorial discourse to the Crocker Post, G. A. R. Relief Corps and Sons of Veterans, in University Place Church, May 28th. His theme was "The Voice of Heroes." The eloquent address was heard by a large audience.

C. W. Van Dolah has been unanimously called to the church at Hennessey, O. T., for another year. There were 45 additions last year; 15 by confession. The apportionment system of finance has been adopted by the church and $1,200 are now in sight toward a new church building. The church seems to be very much endeared to Bro. Van Dolah.

Bro. Battenfield, who has recently been called from Mattoon, Ill., to Eureka Springs, Ark., passed through this city last Friday on his way to his new field of labor, paying his respects to this office while in the city. We wish Bro. Battenfield success in his work with the church at Eureka Springs.

T. A. Reynolds has resigned at Woodland Street Church, Nashville, Tenn., after nearly three years of successful labor at that place. The resignation will take effect Oct. 1st.

H. C. Patterson has gone to Webb City, Mo., to supply the pulpit until September. This is the scene of Bro. Patterson's operations for years, and he will be no stranger among them.

J. W. Coggins, who has been in N. C. for sometime, but now returning to Benton City, this state, called at this office on last Friday long enough to say good morning, and good-by! We are glad to see the improvement in his health and hope it may be permanent.

S. M. Jefferson, president Christian Bible College, Berkley, Cal., who has been visiting his brothers in Illinois since the loss of his wife, called at this office on Friday of last week. Bro. Jefferson speaks in the most hopeful way concerning the outlook for the Bible College at Berkley and of the churches in California. The recent rains and renewed business activities have put new life into the people. Bro. Jefferson expects to call on the editor of this paper at Macatawa on his way back to California via Chicago and the North.

Bro. Jeu Hawk, one of the missionaries to his own people under the auspices of the C. W. B. M. and who for awhile has been stationed at San Francisco, Cal., called at this office on last Monday. He came from Des Moines, where he attended the commencement exercises of Drake University. He will remain here until July, when he will go to Indianapolis to confer with the C. W. B. M. He says that the work on the coast is doing about as well as could be expected under the circumstances.

Dr. J. Harvey Moore, whose professional card appears in this paper, is an occulist of wide reputation, recently came from Atlanta, Ga., to this city. Dr. Moore is the occulist who successfully treated F. N. Calvin, now of Milwaukee, Wis., and J. M. Bovee, of Mozier, Ill. Bro. Calvin was rescued from the verge of total blindness and believes Dr. Moore to be one of the most skillful occulists in the United States. Others likewise speak of him in the highest praise. Dr. Moore recently called at this office and we are pleased with his acquaintance and glad to have him in our city and to make him known to our readers.

The article in a recent number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST entitled "Mongrel Protestantism," I have read, reread and studied. I have been preaching this for years and have been called heretical for so doing. I want to shake hands. I wish the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST was read by every Disciple and everybody else. F. M. BEWITCHED AGAIN.

I regret to say that beautiful Edinburgh has now in its turn gone crazy over "The Sign of the Cross," that extraordinary and fascinating drama of which Mr. Wilson Barrett, the great American actor, is the author, and in which he is the leading performer. London has now fairly forgotten this religious and thrilling play, though about two years ago all this metropolis was under a spell excited by the stage presentation of the persecution of the early Christians. In the Scottish capital hundreds of the clergy from all parts of the North are flocking to see "The Sign of the Cross." Consequently, their congregations are being started in the practice of theatre-going. Many of them will never stop attendance when they have once commenced. Mr. Wilson Barrett is naturally delighted at this most liberal Christian favor for his drama. The churches have made the fortune of that clever stage-player. But the churches will have to pay dearly for their reckless aberration. The seductive serpent of the stage is turning many an English home from a paradise of the sweetest and most wholesome simplicity into a domestic gehenna. I am no enemy to the theatre, the stage, and the music hall, but I never in any way countenance them. I perceive that as they are they are not what they ought to be; and I see that they are not only altogether become abominable in the tendency of their influence, but that, even after all the talk of the cleansing reformation of the modern drama, the stage as an institution is hopelessly corrupt and is ever growing worse. The attempt to purify a sewer with a syringe of lavender water would be sensible compared with the enterprise which the deodorizers of the theater have set themselves. At last even the easy-going and half-worldly English bishops have been constrained to pour into the press and the public ear their disgust at the "Gay Lord Quex," and it is a fact that not a single voice has been lifted in defense of that play now running in London. And yet its author, Mr. Pinero, is not only a dramatist of the front rank, but he has always enjoyed a reputation for writing the purest of modern plays. A gentleman the other day assured me frankly that, though he is a constant patron of the London theater, his conviction is that nine out of every ten of the plays put on the English stage are unfit for presentation to people who have any regard for moral purity and propriety. I now and then in these English letters revert to this topic of the theater, because I consider that it is one of the most vital of all topics. It involves the issues on which will depend the salvation or the destruction of society. I believe with Mr. Spurgeon, that "either the church must kill the theater or the theater will kill the church." I think I could point to churches not a few out of which the love of the drama has taken all spiritual life. As for the Church of England, I do not see that its members are in any great danger from the influence of the stage or any other of the multitudinous frivolities of earth's vanity fair. For more and more the Anglican parsons are converting the churches into play-houses. I have seen in our Ritualistic churches every element except actual dancing which should go to make up a most entertaining play, and I have plainly perceived that the people for the most part were simply admirers of the spectacular and musical effects. It is this sort of thing which killed Spain.

PITY THE POOR MILLIONAIRE!

My heart will soon bleed for poor English and American millionaires unless something can be done to ameliorate their sad lot. We have heard the bitter cry of the London poor, the wail of woe from impoverished curates, and the painful lamentation of the half-starved victims of the sweating capitalists and the grasping landlords. But we are certainly taken by surprise at the sudden and piercing outcries of the possessors of vast fortunes. Two especially of this class of the overwhelmed millionaires have been pouring into the ears of the people of these islands the story of their troubles. One of them is a great British nobleman, the other is a famous American manufacturer. Lord Rosebery has at a public meeting been treating a fashionable audience to the feelings of distress which tear his soul in view of the happiness of the poor working man and the laborer. He himself has been prime minister and knows much of the carking and corroding cares of state. But these are as nothing to the burdens of immense wealth. After all a man, reflects his Lordship, can only eat one dinner a day; and can only wear one coat at a time. Mr. Andrew Carnegie, your big ironmaster, is again with us, and he is very much in evidence. He has arrived at his magnificent estate in Scotland. Passing on his way to his lordly new Highland home, he seems to have been profoundly impressed with the beauty and extent of his property. He told the tenants, who received him with a splendid ovation, that he had been driving for many miles through his vast estates before arriving to greet them, and he had been thinking sadly over the uselessness to one mortal individual of such enormous tracts of land, which it was impossible for one man to really own, in any actual sense of the word, or really to enjoy. Then this most paradoxical and provoking millionaire went on to observe how he envied the lot of the happy peasant or crofter, with his little plot of an acre or two, and his own little cabin in the midst of it! I think that in the whole literature of mocking and cruel satire I have never read anything more senseless and more insulting to struggling humanity than this stupid address. It would be hypocritical to write about it with any patience. Lord Rosebery is almost as bad as Carnegie. In fact, Rosebery would more than satisfy us. Why did you, American friends, send us Carnegie to slobber out on us on this side his envious admiration of poverty and his claims on our sympathy? We do not want to have to attend to the troubles of your poor, distressed millionaires as well as our own. We will try, perhaps, to comfort our earl by inviting him to be premier again, and giving Lord Salisbury a well-earned rest after all the mischief he has done. But we cannot undertake to comfort your Carnegie as well. Take, oh, take poor Carnegie back and leave us to our Rosebery! We will tell him that if a millionaire can only eat one dinner a day, unless he tries the old Roman feather of Vitellius in his throat—well, multitudes of the poor men whom he envies have not really one dinner a week! That is so, alas! in mighty, teeming London. And if a millionaire can only ride in one carriage at a time, the average poor man never in his life stepped into a carriage. There is one good thing to be said for Carnegie to which Rosebery can lay no claim. Your millionaire has really promised to scatter his millions. But they will take a lot of flinging about, and he will have to try hard to get rid of them. The story of how he got his millions has not made a very agreeable impression here. It is too redolent of the gunpowder fired at workers by Pinkerton's men. Some of us remember too much about that episode, and we are not convulsed with admiration at the new munificence. We want to see a millionaire change places for a year or two with a poor man. Then we should like to hear from him again and would listen to him with profound deference.

SPURGEON'S LIFE, VOL. III.

What man has ever lived in this world to be compared with the late Charles Haddon Spurgeon? How can we expect ever again to see the like of that marvelous man? Whom can we pronounce to have caught his mantle? The "Life of C. H. Spurgeon," written by his widow and his secretary, from his own voluminous memoranda, has now reached the third volume. This new installment ought to make an immense impression on the religious opinion of the age. Its frontispiece is exceedingly striking, for it consists of a large quarto page which contains displayed in great capital letters the great pastor's first words at the Tabernacle. These are worth quoting, for they show how very near Mr. Spurgeon was, even at the early stage of his ministry, to the very position which he yet always disputed as being impossibie, though ideal. He all through life clung to just the little shred of sectism which separated him from those with whom if he had only realized it he differed least and agreed the most. He fancied himself a genuine Calvinist, though he was only a very imaginary follower of Calvin.

SPURGEON'S FIRST WORDS IN THE TABERNACLE.

"I would propose that the subject of this ministry in this house, as long as this platform shall stand, and as long as this house shall be frequented by worshipers, shall be the Person of Jesus Christ. I am never ashamed to avow myself a Calvinist; I do not hesitate to take the name of Baptist; but if I am asked what my creed is, I reply, 'It is Jesus Christ.' My venerable predecessor, Dr. Gill, has left a body of divinity, admirable and excellent in its way; but the body of divinity to which I would pin and bind my faith forever, God helping me, is not his system, or any other human treatise; but Jesus Christ, who is the sum and substance of the gospel, who is in himself all theology, the incarnation of every precious truth, the all-glorious personal embodiment of the way, the truth and the life." I trust that very many of my American friends will be able to procure and to read this pathetic and romantic life of the greatest preacher England ever heard.

43 Park Rd., South Tottenham, London, June 2, 1899.

Thousands of sick and suffering people are like the poor cripple in the Bible, who had no one to help him down to the life-giving pool before some one else slipped in ahead of him. So many sufferers feel that if they could only get a little help to overcome their extreme weakness they would then be able to regain their coveted health and strength.

It is just these people that Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is designed to aid. It is the strong, helping hand for those who are in the extreme of bodily weakness and nervous exhaustion. It promptly tones, nourishes and builds up the entire system. It gives keen appetite, good digestion, pure blood, muscular strength, nerve-force and renewed activity.

"When I first wrote you I was completely discouraged," says Mrs. W. M. Satterly, living at Richford, Tioga Co., N. Y. (P. O. Box 40), in a letter to Dr. Pierce. "I was in pain all the time, could not lie in bed on account of severe, sharp cutting pains in my back and right hip. Had pain all through the lower part of my body and my elbows hurt me so much I could scarcely lift my baby. My skin was dry, harsh and scaly and hung like sacks on my arms. My husband called the doctor, and he said it was weakness, and my age. His medicine did me no good. I kept getting worse and weaker. It seemed I should go crazy. One day I wrote you and received advice. I have taken Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, his 'Favorite Prescription' and 'Pleasant Pellets,' and now I can lie in bed with some comfort and can do a good day's work."

The most valuable book for both men and women is Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser. A splendid 1008-page volume, with engravings and colored plates. A copy, paper-covered, will be sent to anyone sending twenty-one cents in one-cent stamps, to pay the cost of mailing only, to Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y. Cloth-bound, 31 stamps.

New York Letter.

It was my privilege to attend the annual Sunday-school convention of New York state at Poughkeepsie last week and, notwithstanding the extremely hot weather, it was an inspiring, helpful meeting, in which many of the best Sunday-school workers in the country took part. Mr. E. W. Hawley, secretary of the State S. S. Association, says there are more than 400,000 children in Protestant families in this state who do not attend Sunday-school anywhere. And more than 2,000,000 children, Protestant and Catholic, are found in the enlightened, progressive, wide-awake Empire State, who never attend the sessions of a Bible-school. For every 68 children in the state in the Sunday-school there are 32 without—almost one-third. Is not New York a great mission field? Is not the call presented by these facts and figures in behalf of this great army of little children, destitute of religious training, an urgent one? We ought to be planting Sunday-school missions within reach of these children, for the hope of the church and the welfare of human society in the coming generations depend upon the training of the children now in our care. The themes of the convention were (1) THE PEOPLE: (a) In Abraham's Time, by Dr. J. L. Hurlburt; (b) The Israelites, by Dr. A. F. Schauffler; (c) In Christ's Time, by Rev. A. H. McKinney. (2) THE BOOK: (a) The Old Testament, by Rev. C. N. Sims; (b) The New Testament, by Geo. F. Pentecost. (3) THE PROPHETS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT: (a) Moses, by Dr. D. J. Burrell; (b) Elijah, Rev. E. N. Packard; (c) Isaiah, Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman. (4) APOSTLES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT: (a) John, Rev. W. H. Van Allen; (b) Paul, Rev. G. M. Colville; (c) Peter, Rev. C. A. Barbour. (5) THE MESSIAH: (a) Humiliated, Rev. J. D. Phelps; (b) Exalted, Rev. R. S. MacArthur. The Rev. Theo. L. Cuyler gave one of his redhot temperance lectures to the delight of all. And many other matters of practical importance were considered. Outside the four delegates representing the two schools of the 169th St. Church I could not find a single other delegate from any of our schools in the state. Need we be surprised that we are not recognized on the programs of these conventions?

One object of the visit to Poughkeepsie was to look into the possibility of organizing the few Disciples there for a forward aggressive work. I called on Sister Amanda F. Waite and Bro. James Abercrombie and counseled with them concerning the inauguration of the movement. I found them both anxious that the cause of Christ as conceived and preached by the Disciples should be represented in that city. Sister Waite and her husband who, though himself not a Christian, said they were ready to give the work strong financial backing if only it were started aright. Mr. Waite made me a liberal offer toward this end if I would see to it that a Church of the Disciples of Christ were organized and wisely fostered for three years in that city. I am told that many of the people of Poughkeepsie were dissatisfied with human creeds and were seeking to know the will of God in his Word. Several circles for Bible study have been organized with this object in view. It seems that the conditions are favorable for the beginning of the work in Poughkeepsie.

A strong movement is just now being made under the leadership of Controller Bird S. Coller, to purchase Coney Island, the notorious seaside resort and turn it into a park. Many ministers and churches are advocating the adoption of the proposition, and urging the aldermanic council to condemn Coney Island and take possession of it to be made into a city park. For many years this world-famed resort has bsen one of the plague-spots of Greater New York. Now the people are making up their minds to cleanse it and make of it a wholesome resort, especially for the poor. The rich can and do go to any resort they choose, those of moderate means go the mountains, while the poorest wage-earners and their families are compelled to stay in the city all the long, hot summer through, and if they go away to the beach for a day, the nearest place and cheapest trip is to Coney Island. And there they encounter all kinds of debasing and contaminating influences. To go there with one's children is to endanger their moral health. It should be made a clean, healthful seaside park for the poor.

In the Land of the Turks.

MARCH 22, '99.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—On the 10th inst., Friday morning, I landed at Alexandretta, and after I mailed my last letter to you, I purposed to start at once for Antioch, aiming to go to the church in Bithias on the following day that I might be with Bro. M. Filian and his little flock on Lord's day. But the Turkish officers who had taken my teskerah at the landing for examination would not return it to me until the U. S. Consul, Mr. H. L. Washington, very kindly consented to send his dragoman and demand it. But considerable time was lost, and when my teskerah came to my hands it was too late, and I was obliged to stay at Alexandretta until the next morning. The recent rains had made great mud pools all along the road, through which, after ten hours' hard drive and an ugly break-down at last, we safely crossed the old stone bridge over the Orontes with our four-abreast horses, and put up in the "New Hotel" built over the river. Soon several friends came to welcome me, some of whom I had met here and at Bithias years ago. I spent the Lord's day in the city more profitably than I expected. Over twenty persons called in my room at different times during the day, most of whom had questions to ask about our preaching, baptism, our differences with other denominations, about Mormon and Sabbatarian doctrines, both of which had recently come into this field and had created a religious interest among the people. Among those who came to see me was a middle-sized fat man with rosy cheeks and pleasant countenance, of apparently 70 years of age, entered my room following a man who was known to me, and while I was looking for an introduction he threw his fat arms round my neck and kissing me twice triumphantly said, "Such is the exhortation of our beloved Bro. Paul. This is the holy kiss of our brotherhood." Though a Greek by nationality, he speaks in Arabic and knows a little Turkish. He was baptized by Bro. Filian some three years ago in this city, and is quite familiar with the Scriptures, which he quotes with ease. His name is Hannak Kara Eusuff Oghloo. The chief of the police, under feigned friendship, caused me to put off my going to Bithias until Friday morning, assuring me that he would send a mounted guard with me for my safety. But as no one was sent until 9:30 A. M. I started alone with my muleteer I had already hired. I spent a whole week with the church in Bithias, and they were greatly encouraged and the Lord added a precious soul to their number. The chief of the police, finding out that I was gone, had telegraphed to the Turkish officers to watch my movements. Two of them came into the town at different times with their armed attendants, and very politely asked me to see my teskerah, at the same time urging me not to remain long in the place. I return to Antioch to-day, and expect to leave for Aleppo to-morrow morning.

FRIDAY, March 24, '99.

I have been compelled to postpone leaving this city until next Monday, and I am glad to say that I have been fully convinced that the Lord has a great work prepared for us to do in this historic city. The labors of both the Presbyterian and Congregationalist missions who have done so much for this people by their schools and preaching, well prepared them to hunger for the apostolic Christianity which was preached by the apostles in Antioch. It is a sad sight to see that their work has come to a standstill, and they are not able to satisfy the longings of the people any longer whom they led from error and superstition to the light of the gospel by their faithful labors of many years. I have been told by many who have come to see me that if we would send here a faithful preacher to labor in this city, many of the people would gladly obey the gospel. Two well-known men of families, desiring to be buried with Christ, gladly confessed the Savior yesterday, and I immersed them in the Orontes. An indescribable feeling of joy and gratitude came over me as we stood by the swift-running waters. I felt that Paul and Barnabas and the whole church of Antioch had come down to encourage us by their presence and approval.

As a people we started to do a work worthy of our "Jubilee Year." This one good resolution has evidently met the gracious approval of our Father in heaven who is leading us to victory. Then let us humbly follow his guidance and enlist the city of Antioch as one of our mission fields in this country. To do this we only need at least one thousand dollars a year for the support of a preacher and a school-teacher, and for the rent of a suitable building. All that is necessary for the grand undertaking is already prepared and can be brought in by a judicious and careful management, if we act promptly. If ten churches will contribute one hundred dollars each, or twenty churches fifty dollars each per year, we will soon have a successful mission in the city of Antioch, the birthplace of our most holy name "Christian." During my visit to the church in Bithias I received urgent letters from Anitah, Masark, Albooston, Deinbekis and Hainak, from our neglected brethren, to hasten and to go to visit them. They say they are left "like sheep without a shepherd." I feel anxious to go to them as soon as possible. I do not expect to write bright reports, for I know I shall see much misery, destitution and want amongst them. Yours in hope,

G. N. SHISHMANIAN.

Antioch, Syria.

Honolulu Letter.

Twelve years ago the leading business men of these islands scoffed at the idea of a railroad being built here that would be a paying investment, but Mr. B. F. Dillingham, whose capital consisted wholly in brains, thought otherwise. By his constant labor and marvelous perseverance under the most discouraging circumstances, he succeeded in organizing the Oahu Railroad and Land Company, and in 1898 completing the road to Kahuka, 71 miles from this city. In 1890 18 miles of the road was completed, and since then it has been a success in every way.

Mr. Dillingham's wife is the daughter of Rev. Smith, one of the pioneer missionaries, and for 30 years pastor of Kaumakapili church, the second native church of this city. His daughter is now the successful Sunday-school superintendent of the same church.

On the 10th of this month Mrs. Dillingham invited about 30 people to be her guests for the day and take a trip on the railroad to Waialua, 55 miles from this city. The company consisted of ministers, missionaries, the wives of missionaries and two whose deceased parents were missionaries. Among them were the following who had been 25 years or more in Japan: Rev. John Gulick and wife, Rev. O. H. Gulick and wife, Dr. M. L. Gordon and wife and Dr. Harris. The latter now lives in San Francisco and is superintendent of all the M. E. Japanese missions on the Pacific Coast and these islands. There were also with us our W. K. Azbill and wife, Rev. G. L. Pearson and wife of the M. E. Church, Rev. H. J. Bruce, 40 years a missionary in Satara, India, Rev. O. P. Emerson, president of the Hawaiian Board of Missions, H. E. Coleman, of the elders of the Christian Church, and general secretary of the Y. M. C. A., Prof. Frank Damon, principal of Mills Institute for Chinese boys, the writer's wife and a number of others whose names I do not now recall. I am sure I never enjoyed the association of a more congenial, sociable and enjoyable company.

The day was one of Hawaii's best. We rode in an elegant palace car and every possible attention was given us for our comfort and happiness.

The railroad runs through many of the largest rice and sugar plantations on these islands, is scarcely ever out of sight of the sea on one side and the mountains on the other. The scenery is unusually attractive and impressive, also of great variety.

We left this city at 9:15 A. M. and at 10:30 A. M. we were served with an elegant lunch. At 12 M. we reached our destination.

Nature, so lavish with her gifts on these islands, could hardly have done more to prepare a place for pleasure, recreation and health, and the brains of Mr. Dillingham are fast supplying all that man can do to make it what it certainly will be, one of the most desirable resorts in the world. A beautiful and commodious hotel with several cottages have recently been completed with all modern conveniences, a few rods from which glides a large mountain stream which with the ocean cove into which it empties a little farther on, form most excellent opportunity for fishing and bathing.

A sandy beach abounding in shells stretches up and down the coast. A six miles ride over a picturesque mountain road overlooking the sea brings the hunter to one of the hotel annexes, where wild turkeys and other game abound.

The hotel not yet being open for guests, at 1 P. M. we were treated to a bountiful repast of chicken, pie, tropical fruits and other good things that make a preacher happy, in the lanai (veranda) belonging to ex-Queen Liliuokalani.

Among other places of interest we visited the old home of the Rev. Mr. Emerson, built by him in 1832 and for many years occupied by that eminent pioneer missionary. Two of his sons were of our company and seemed to greatly enjoy looking at the places were they had played with the little Kanakas 40 years ago.

At 2:50 P. M. we hurried from the beach, where we had gathered some very fine specimens of shells, and took the train for home, all being very earnest in our praises of Mr. and Mrs. Dillingham for making it possible for us to enjoy one of the most delightful days that ever falls to the lot of a fortunate preacher.

Can the English-born Talk Chinese?

I recently heard one of our leading men say he would rather undertake to scale the most impossible wall than try to learn an Oriental language. He implied that the effort would inevitably be doomed to failure and that no one of English or American birth could expect success—that they could not talk so a Chinaman could understand.

"Uncle Will can!" whispered my seven-year-old Morrison to his sister. He has been in China and knows the ability of Dr. Macklin to make himself thoroughly intelligible to the Chinese through their own tongue. As a matter of fact our missionaries do learn Japanese and Chinese so the people are delighted to listen to them talk and ask for more. By inheritance and education they have so rich a store of truths to bring before their hearers that they are frequently more popular than the native preachers. One of our men has talked two hours of an evening and been asked by the intensely interested audience to rest awhile and give them more. It is frequently remarked by Japanese that Dr. Verbeck was more eagerly listened to than Japanese scholars. He was one of Japan's grandest missionaries, laboring there some thirty years. He was decorated by the emperor because of his invaluable services to the government, and had military burial, the emperor presenting his widow with five hundred yen. He died only a little over a year ago. Our own beloved Charles E. Garst sleeps by his side. It was in the early day that Dr. Verbeck did such exceptional service. The same would be impossible now, no matter how efficient the missionary, because the times are so different. I thing we forget, sometimes, what it is to have always had the Bible, sweet Christian hymns, family worship, a praying mother!

In coming generations our beloved Oriental brethren will count among their ancestry many a sainted Eunice and Lois, and then they will not need so much as now the loving helpers in whose viens flows the sacred blood of Christian centuries. Why did our Japanese brethren, in convention assembled, ask Bros. Garst and Guy to take the evangelistic field and preach Christ throughout Japan? Experience has proved that the foreigner gets the largest audiences and best attention. In Japan this is not due to curiosity. The foreigner gives his hearers the greatest treat and most valuable help. A member of Parliament said of Mr. Garst, "He loved Japan more than we!" This love, that has brought the message from afar, powerfully backs the message and makes it easier to prove the infinite love of Jesus.

Are not these formidable Oriental languages some of the mountains we are promised strength to remove if only we have faith as a mustard seed? Our brother not only thought the languages were unconquerable, but stated that the miasmas and deadly fevers mowed our workers down, and that death was the reward for going to these countries. He that is willing to lose his life for Christ's sake knows he shall surely find it. In urging the importance of Home Missions our brother made some careless statements about Foreign. When the world has grown so very small, does it not seem the terms home and foreign have become misnomers? Manila seems a part, a precious part of home when our darling boy is there! The frightfully corrupt society of the rient calls trumpet-tongued to the Christian world for godly men and women to bring the light. Our own children must suffer if we do not respond to the call.

Our Colored Preachers.

Many of our brethren and sisters are doubtless ignorant of the fact that we are making an effort to evangelize the negro population of this country, and this article is written with the view of opening the eyes of many on this subject. The American Christian Missionary Society has established a training school, known as the Louisville Christian Bible School. It is located at 1820-1822 Duncan St., in our delightful city. On Thursday night, June 8, the writer laid aside his usual pastoral work, took a street car to the Central Christian Church (colored) and there attended the anniversary exercises of the school. There were only three white persons in the house: Prof. A. J. Thomson, the efficient principal, Dr. M. K. Allen, and myself.

The school, numbering about 25, took seats upon the platform and the exercises began. The program consisted of stirring hymns, well-delivered declamations andeloquent seven-minute sermons. The subject-matter of these addresses was fine, showing considerable thought and indicating to my mind that these men would be more than able to hold their own with colored sectarian preachers. These young men work during leisure hours and thus pay their way through school. It occurs to the writer that our home board is making a splendid investment when it spends a little of its money in educating colored men at this institution to go out into the world and proclaim Jesus to their people. Give the negro of the South an intelligent faith in Jesus Christ and that will solve the race problem.

June Meeting at Buffalo.

The "June meeting" is a convention of Disciples peculiar to Western New York. It corresponds in character to the yearly meeting, or grove meeting, of Northern Ohio. The isolated condition of many of the Disciples within the district, in the past, made such a meeting very dssirable, if not quite necessary. They, therefore, came together annually, at a stated time, to engage in such services as would naturally result in a spiritual uplift—to hear the gospel, to pray and praise together, to renew old associations and to enjoy Christian fellowship. The first June meeting was held thirty two years ago, when A. N. Gilbert, of saintly memory, occupied the platform. At the next meeting, J. S. Sweeney, of Paris, Ky., was the principal speaker.

At the June meeting just held in the Richmond Avenue Church of Christ, Buffalo, Bro. Sweeney was again called to the front. It need hardly be said that he brought many pleasant memories to some and great joy to all. His presence was like the construction of a bridge from 1866 to 1899. It is a noteworthy fact that when the Buffalo meeting was called to order, at its very first session every one of our preachers in Western New York was present. The following brethren took part in the exercises appointed for the various sessions: Norton, of Niagara Falls; Benham and Hootman, of North Tonawanda; Powell, of Williamsville; Lutton, of North Lancaster; Woodell, of Clarence; Hayden, of Pembroke; Bell, of Pekin; Muckley, of Waterloo; Bower, of East Aurora; Bolton, of Fredonia, and McPherson, Egbert and Rice, of Buffalo.

Bro. W. F. Cowden came all the way from Tacoma, Wash., to make an eloquent and rousing plea for the evangelization of America; and Sister Julia Gerould laid down her chosen work in Cleveland for a little space that she might come and electrify the convention at the C. W. B. M. session with an address on "Threescore and Ten." These, with Bro. Sweeney, constituted the more remote speaking force of the meeting.

At the Bible-school session on Friday afternoon, Bro. Egbert spoke upon the influence and Bro. Hootman upon the power of the teacher. These addresses were followed by a most interesting and impressive demonstration of primary methods, under the direction of Mrs. Piers and Mrs. G. H. Dunston. At the Saturday morning session Bro. McPherson spoke on "The Balance-wheel of the Christian Life;" Bro. Powell, on "Church Development;" Bro. Denham, on "The Message of the Preacher," and Bro. Norton on "The Leak in the Churches." These were strong, masterly efforts, which are sure to be remembered. Sister Laura Gerould Craig, of Buffalo, teacher of the normal class in the Richmond Avenue Church, presided at the C. W. B. M. session on Saturday afternoon, when there was a roll call, followed by the presentation of the prize banner; a discussion relative to "Taking a Vacation," in which the wives of various clergymen participated and a good many bright things were said; also an elaborate paper by Miss Ida C. Darsie on the "Local Work of the Auxiliary." The exercises culminated in Mrs. Gerould's splendid address. The Saturday evening session began with a most interesting "Illustrated Song Service." A unique feature consisted of stereopticon views of buildings and scenes conneted with Mahoba (India) Mission, in charge of that glorious woman, Miss Mary Graybiel, a member of the Richmond Avenue Church. Lord's day was, most fittingly, the crowning day of the convention. The church was filled to overflowing with Disciples who gathered from all the churches in the city and from surrounding towns. The Lord's Supper was served by deacons representing the various churches of Western New York. The six o'clock Endeavor service was largely attended and very interesing. At the preliminary service, beginning at seven o'clock, impromptu speeches, which were especially enjoyed, were made by Dr. Anson G. Chester, of Richmond Avenue Church; Dr. Gerould and Sister Gerould, of Cleveland; Bro. Hayden, of Pembroke; Bro. Sinclair, of Toronto, Canada, and others. The singing of the chorus choir, under the enthusiastic leadership of Bro. A. B. Kellogg, was especially inspiring. The several sermons by Bro. Sweeney were worthy of himself and of his pedigree, which is all that need be said. The convention throughout was marked by great enthusiasm and cannot fail to be the means of great good to all our churches. The superb entertainment provided by the ladies of the church on Saturday deserves special mention. It seems to have been the unanimous opinion that this was the best June meeting ever held.

LLOYD DARSIE.

"Is There Not a Better Way?"

Under the head, "Union of Temperance Forces," we have a telling editorial in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, June 8. It surely will put many to thinking seriously. And that is what we need to do—get the people to thinking.

If we only could bring out and combine the sentiment against the saloon we could at once smite the evil to the ground.

After saying some of us have been voting the prohibition ticket for years because there was nothing else we could conscientiously do; that is to say, we could not conscientiously vote with a party which licenses and protects and perpetuates the saloon, the editor then says, "But many are asking, Is there not a better way?" Then very easily and naturally drifts into the channel which thousands for years have been in until it has become a rut.

The vain imagination that it must be some other than a political remedy. Somehow, in some way, at some time, all vague and indefinite (and delusive, too), all of the sentiment in the hearts of all of the people of all political parties is to be brought together and unified and concentrated and brought to bear upon the then doomed saloon. The Democrats will still be Democrats, and the Republicans still Republicans, and on all matters and issues save that of the saloon they will vote for Democratic and Republican measures.

Very beautiful theory, and if there were no men in politics interested in keeping the saloon open it would work like a charm.

Why don't we do something of this kind? Why has it not been done long ago?

Why did not Pilate release Jesus and let him go? Why did not our Christian President abolish the army canteen? For the reason that politics said, Don't!

Politics says, Don't bring this matter of the saloon before the people as a separate issue and solely on its merits.

Let us look this theory squarely in the face. The saloon element says to the Democract and Republican parties, Don't, and they don't. Why don't they? Their master says don't.

The fact, the naked fact, is that the saloon has so much influence over the political parties that they are able to defeat every effort to get this matter before the people as a separate issue.

This utopian dream will be but a dream until Christian men and all who fear and hate the saloon bring the saloon question into their politics as the first and greatest political question, which in very truth it is.

No. There is not a better way. God gave us the ballot, and he means that we shall use it right.

It is the best way and the only way.

E. L. FRAZIER.

Marion, Ind.

[Certainly, the "best way" for Christian voters is to use the ballot against the saloon. This is not now being done to any large extent. Can we get more of them to do it by allowing them to do so in their own parties? That was our inquiry.—EDITOR.]

The Temperance Question.

BROTHER EDITOR:—I am greatly pleased with your editorial suggestions along the line of temperance reform. And as you have opened the way for suggestions I wish to make a few.

And first of all I wish to say that it is a mistake to expect to get rid of the saloons immediately. It is a fixture of our civilization, and according, to the best statisticians 80 per cent. of the drunkenness of our age is hereditary. These two facts are alarming, and at once suggest the awful proportions of the problem that confronts us. In my judgment there are three lines of work that can be accepted by all who are at all in favor of reform, to wit, agitation of conditions, reformation of character and formation of character. And as a movement of any kind must have a sharply defined central idea around which to rally, I wish to suggest the following:

1. Alcohol, while having its legitimate field of operation, is acknowledged by all to be a powerful poison and unfit for use as a beverage.

2. Alcohol being a poison it is not unreasonable to ask that it be placed under the same restrictions and regulations that morphine and other poisons are placed.

3. In order to accomplish the foregoing it is necessary (1) to abolish the government revenue. We must show the people that the traffic could not live were it not for the strong arms of our government thrown about it. (2) No man shall be charged anything for the privilege of selling, for the reasons that if the sale of the stuff is wrong a license can not make it right; and if it be right to sell it, no man should be charged for doing that which is right. (3) The man who handles it shall be placed under a heavy bond, with the law fixing his duty to keep a record when, the amount, to whom and for what purpose it is sold. It would be well to make a nonpartisan campaign in order to get the ears and eyes of the people. It might be well for temperance agitators to circulate a petition to our state legislators and our national Congress to enact such laws. By this method we could both create and register sentiment.

Lastly, we should be more concerned in agitating the conditions than in offering plans. The first thing in order, as I view it, is to get the people to want to get rid of the saloon, and where there is a will, wisdom will make a way. Let us get together and go to work in the name of Him who hath said that "no drunkard shall enter the kingdom of God," and if we are active and faithful I fully believe, for I am compelled to believe, that he will lead us aright.

Ministerial Relief.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—I wish to state through your paper that district No. 3 in its last convention appointed a superintendent of Ministerial Relief, and I wish to ask the preachers and elders in the district for a collection on the first Lord's day in July. Will you not aid in the matter? While we are in sympathy with the work, yet very little is being done for the cause, and while we think, sing, pray and preach about missions let us do something for the old soldiers who fought our first battles in the mission fields. Many cases of charity now exist with no means provided for their wants. We talk about being apostolic; if we are we will do something for their relief.

Brethren, do your duty and urge a liberal offering and forward to me, and you will be receipted for it, and I will send it to the national superintendent.

Arkansas State Convention.

The convention at Hot Springs was decidedly the best, all things considered, that we have had since the writer has been associated with the mission work in this state. It opened with a characteristic and very effective sermon on "Our Plea," by S. W. Crutcher, of Pine Bluff. This was followed by a practical address by John Fletcher, of Little Rock, president of the convention, on the state work and its importance. These addresses sounded the keynote of the convention.

The following have labored a part or all the time under the auspices of our mission boards during the year: S. W. Crutcher, Pine Bluff; T. N. Kincaid, Hot Springs; G. P. Young, Mena and DeQueen; Frederic Wyatt, Mena; E. S. Allhands, Arkadephia; Geo. Clark, Southwest district; J. H. Jones, Caddo Gap district; Henry Martin, Colorado evangelist, besides others who have done missionary work in many fields and been helped directly and indirectly by our co-operative methods.

Those mentioned, with the corresponding secretary, have done work amounting to about seven years of one man, in fields that could not have been reached without help, and at an outlay of mission funds of $1293.45.

The fields been among the most important in the state. Too much praise cannot be given to the faithful evangelists whose names are mentioned above, and others equally faithful whose names must be ommitted for want of space. The report of the board was read by the corresponding secretary.

Bro. Jessup, of Little Rock, preached an excellent discourse at 11 A. M., keeping up the spirit of the meeting. Wednesday afternoon and night were occupied by the ladies. Seven new auxiliaries were organized during the year, and others strengthened.

Bible Chairs at the University occupied a considerable portion of the time, and elicited much interest.

Thursday forenoon N. M. Ragland gave a very encouraging report on the Christian Endeavor interests among the churches. G. R. Stainer, of Argenta, gave a splendid talk on city missions in which field he is a specialist, having spent several years in city work in London. He is doing good work in Argenta, and if he can be kept in Arkansas will be quite an addition to the preaching forces of the state. S. W. Crutcher, of Rine Bluff, presented the claims of the A. C. M. S. Educational matters, including schools and literature, by N. M. Ragland, L. C. Wilson and Dr. Shibley. B. F. Clay, of Kansas City, presented the claims of Ministerial Aid in a very pathetic speech, in response to which $51.91 cash and $14.50 pledges were given to that fund.

Church Extension claims were ably presented by J. T. Ogle, of Carrollton, Mo. Church Extension has done much for Arkansas and we ought to contribute according to our ability to the fund. In the afternoon Foreign Missions was presented in a very good address by B. F. Clay. The principal part of the afternoon was consumed in the consideration of Arkansas missions, closing with a model sermon by N. M. Ragland, whose influence for good will not be known this side of eternity. This was followed by most liberal pledges. Every preacher present as far as now recalled, made personal pledges of from $10 to $50. It may be hard on the preachers, but no missions will ever be a marked success until the preachers come to the work with liberal contributions. This is an encouraging feature of the Hot Spings convention.

Another noticeable and encouraging feature of the convention was in the personnel, consisting of a number of business and and professional men, laboring men and intelligent and cultured ladies, who were there in the interest of the "Father's business." It is very necessary that preachers should attend, but a missionary meeting composed mainly of of preachers is discouraging.

Among many in other walks of life, it will not be thought invidious to mention B. R. Davidson, the overworked attorney of the "Frisco Road," the largest contributor to missions among the Disciples in the state of Arkansas, John Fletcher, of Little Rock, whose law business calls for his entire time. Drs. Shibley and Connell, physicians of large practice, Alex. C. Hull, secretary of state, one of the busiest men in the state, and one of the liberal contributors to our mission work, etc., etc. When such men leave their offices to attend, it means success. The financial outlook is better than it has ever been before. Churches were represented that have all along stood aloof from co-operation. Mention ought to be made of the heroic and telling work being done by Bro. Kincaid and his faithful colaborers in Hot Springs, one of the most strategic points in the state for our work.

Bro. Wilson, editor of Christian Work, is getting the paper apparently on a sound financial basis.

The common expressions heard as the meeting was brought to a close was that the memory of the Hot Springs convention will be a source of inspiration and encouragement in the labors for the Master. "It will be a green day in my memory." "It will be a red-letter day," etc. Bro. Clay and Bro. Ogle, the only visitors from without the state, were much help to us. Pray God's blessing upon the Arkansas work, with all other missionary interests.

Wonders of the Sky

BY W. J. RUSSELL.

82 pages. Bound in beautiful illuminated cloth .....$ .50

This book leads the mind of the reader to contemplate the beauty, grandeur, sublimity and wonders of the heavens, directing them to a better understanding of the universe, and greater reverence for the Creator. The subject is treated, not from a scientific standpoint, but is presented in a popular style calculated to be easily understood by readers, both adults and the young.

The author of this book has looked reverently and thoughtfully into this olded volume of God's Revelation and states in a clear and eloquent way some of the facts and truths which he has learned in this charming little book.—Extract from Introduction by J. H. Garrison.

One good feature about this book is that it is brief, yet its pages are crammed full of interesting information and inspiring thoughts.—PROF. G. P. COLER, Ann Arbor, Mich.

W. J. Russell is thoroughly conversant with astronomical literature, yet the magnitude of the study has been cleverly constructed by the author into simple, earnest language that cannot fail to entertain as well as instruct.—Daily Telegraph, Kalamazoo, Mich.

Truth Stranger Than Fiction

A STORY OF A STRUGGLE AFTER THE TRUTH AS IT IS FOUND IN CHRIST.

By D. R. DUNGAN.

Many editions of this book have been sold, and the demand increases. It is the most popular book on FIRST PRINCIPLES ever published by our people.

This volume discusses no new themes, nor does it present novel ideas upon the old theme of Christianity. Its novelty is found in protesting against novelties in religion, and insisting upon the usages of the primitive Church. It adopts a method for the discussion of salvation from sin which is, it is hoped, adapted to the popular education on the religious issues of the day. It was written for the benefit of, and is dedicated to, the people, with the prayer and hope that it will be widely read, and that it will do them good.

The author has carefully avoided technical expressions and obscure phrases, in order that it might meet their wants. He has endeavored to take these questions from the exclusive hands of the theologians, and place them in the hands of the people for their own adjudication. Will they, like the Bereans, examine the Scriptures to see whether these things be so?

Notes and News.

Commencement week at Hiram College begins on Saturday night, June 17th, and closes on Thursday night, June 22nd.

The Mississippi Christian Endeavor Union Convention was held at Meridian, June 1-4, and is said to have been "the best of all."

Bro. Mutchler reports that a fraud preacher has been circulating in the neighborhood of Footeville, Wis., and swindled several brethren out of small sums of money.

C. G. McNeill,
Wisconsin State Missionary.

The First Christian Church, Marion, Ind., will celebrate its 22nd anniversary, with appropriate services, July 22. All former pastors and evangelists who may read this are requested to write short letters to be read that day.

E. L. Frazier, Pastor.

There were 537 at our Bible-school yesterday. Our Children's Day offering amounted to $236.62, and others are yet to be heard from. This is an increase of over $106 over last year. W. J. M.

Bellaire, O.

James H. Brooks, of Corinth, Miss., says that there are too many pastorless churches in that state. Five preachers were added to their force during the last convention year and some have gone in since, but still there is room for many more. He speaks in the highest praise of Bro. Johnson and his work at Kimberlin Heights, Tenn. Also of Bro. Stevens, the state evangelist of Mississippi.

A postal card from E. C. states that the church at Waterloo, Ia., recently took up its first missionary collection, $23.70, which it will divide with five mission boards. Also, in answer to an appeal from Joel Brown, it gave $6.05 for the Christian Orphans' Home, this city. We are glad to see new churches enlisting in missionary and benevolent activities.

Alfred Brunk, pastor of the Gethsemane Church, Newmans, Va., writes that he is encouraged with indications of success at that point. He reports larger audiences for the season than he has yet known and other evidences of prosperity. He commends C. W. Huffer, pastor of the Christian Church in Toledo, O., for voting against a resolution brought up at a meeting of the pastors' union of that city urging the city of Toledo to take charge of her saloons. What we need, he says, is not control of the saloon, but its abolition, and so think we.

The annual report of the Central Christian Church, San Diego, Cal., for the year ending June first, shows a healthful condition of the church. All of the activities of the church are represented in the report with good results. Four Bethany Reading Circles were organized this year engaging forty persons in the work. The Middletown Mission, another work of the Central Church, is prospering and the report says that every indication points to its permanency. W. E. Crabtree is the pastor.

Mary Stade writes encouragingly of the work in Western Kansas. There are four organized churches in Rooks County, to wit, Stockton, 115 members; Plainville, 160; Green Mound, 25 and Webster. These churches are organized for work with Dr. B. Hill, of Stockton, president. Their first convention was held May 24th at Plainville. W. H. Vallette preaches at Stockton, Green Mound, Webster and Elm Creek. During Mrs. Clara H. Hazelrigg's pastorate of the Plainville Church, including a previous meeting, 170 members have been added. At the close of her year's engagement with this church she will respond to calls in other fields although the Plainville Church has entreated her to remain with them another year. There is a Bible-school at Stockton, Plainville, Green Mound and Elm Creek, and two Christian Endeavor Societies in the county. The C. E. Society at Stockton has taken up the Bethany Reading Course. Stockton and Plainville have also a C. W. B. M. auxiliary. We are glad to note these evidences of Christian work in Western Kansas.

Dedication.

I dedicated the church at New Richmond, O., June 4, 1899. It is a frame building, has a seating capacity of 300 and is a gem. Many of the best preachers of the brotherhood have preached in the old building. I stayed over and preached a few sermons for them, and had one baptism. They are in need of a young pastor. Those corresponding should address J. W. Moss. I stayed at the home of F. M. Pursell, a man who fears God with all his house. I begin at Temple, Texas, June 21st. H. W. Laye is the pastor there.

I recently baptized one convert in Lake Michigan, at Manitosooc, where the little band continues to meet faithfully under the leadership of F. J. Ives.

H. F. Barstow is doing occasional preaching at Bloom City, Berea and West Lima.

Through the great generosity of Bro. John Robertson, of Colorado Springs, Col., who formerly resided at Plattsville, this state, the church at the latter place is enabled to pay off the indebtedness on their house. One pledge on this debt was made by one of Uncle Sam's soldier boys in Cuba, Lieut. Harry Gilmore, son of Bro. Hiram Gilmore, of Whitewater.

I have been assisting in changing our Norwegian church at Chippewa Falls into an American church. Since dedication day Bro. Julius Stone has baptized eight and received four others into the church. Their English Sunday-school will soon be a very important factor in their work. We organized an English prayer-meeting also, and a Woman's Missionary Society, auxiliary to the C. W. B. M., which will conduct its meetings in English. There are twelve members, and eight copies of the Tidings were subscribed for.

Jubilee Convention Notes.

Our first bulletin of information about the Jubilee Convention has been issued and is being sent out rapidly. Promises of a large convention continue to pour in. Bro. E. B. Bagby writes us that great enthusiasm was manifest in the Philadelphia convention for the Jubilee and that Cincinnati may expect at least a train load from the East in October. Bro. J. B. Sweeney thinks that Texas will send five hundred. One C. E. Society in Kentucky has already arranged to send fifteen. Let the good news continue.

The enlarged Children's Day offering is a sure promise of a large convention. Sunday-schools should begin at once to raise money to send their superintendent or some one to represent them at the convention.

Anxious that our educational institutions should be well represented, we have appointed the following local committee to represent their respective colleges and to co-operate with their alumni associations in arranging for the usual college banquet or any other meeting desired:

Lexington, E. K. VanWinkle, Madisonville, O.; Bethany, H. G. Hill, North Side, Cincinnati, O.; Eureka, G. A. Miller, P. O. Box 304, Cincinnati, O.; Drake, A. W. Taylor, Norwood, O.; Hiram, J. N. Green, 611 Richmond St., Cincinnati, O.

If other colleges desire any special arrangements, let them write us.

The Hiram Jubilee.

We have one more year ahead of us before our Jubilee Commencement comes off. In June, 1900, our institution will be fifty years old. We have chosen this conspicuous date as the time for adequately endowing our institution.

Dear Brother, Friend:—Will you not join us in this movement? Do you not want to put a little money where it will work perpetually for the cause we love? Then send the donation to the Hiram College Endowment Fund. There is nothing so enduring as a well-endowed college. Harvard was founded soon after the landing of the Pilgrim fathers. Money put into Harvard College two hundred and fifty years ago is at work there still. Cambridge and Oxford are older than all the dynasties of the English throne. Money put into these colleges five hundred years ago is at work still, and for aught we can see will be at work, for thousands of years to come. If you put money into buildings they may be destroyed by fire, and if not they will inevitably decay; a few years and they are gone. Money put into college endowment will remain and continue to work in the most efficient way for the accomplishment of good for centuries and millenniums. College endowment is by all means the very best benevolent investment that can be made.

Let fifty thousand persons unite for the endowment of Hiram College. Send your name.

Hiram, Ohio. E. V. Zollars.

Illinois Encampment.

Illinois Encampment will be held at Eureka July 24-30, 1899. The committee have prepared one of the best programs ever given. Such men and women as T. W. Grafton, C. J. Scofield, J. H. Gilliland, H. L. Willett, Burris A. Jenkins, Hon. Champ Clark, Miss Anna Hale and Mrs. Helen Moses will be heard at this meeting.

H. N. Herrick, railroad secretary, has secured the usual rate of one and one-third fare on the certificate plan from all points in Illinois and from St. Louis, provided that 100 tickets are purchased.

Lyda's Wood, so well and favorably known to all, will be open as usual and on the same terms for entertainment. Prof. O. B. Clark, of Eureka, will act as chairman of the entertainment committee. See next week's issue of our papers for the complete program.

Each church in the state will also receive a number of programs. We earnestly ask that the preachers, or those to whom they are sent, see that the people know of the encampment, how to get there, the probable cost and the advantage of being there. Will you make a public announcement of the program as soon as you receive it?

The special days will represent the C. W. B. M. work, I. C. M. C., Eureka College, state Sunday-school work and Christian Endeavor.

Special features are such as "Bible Reading," by Burris A. Jenkins, of Indianapolis, also popular lecture by Hon. Champ Clark, of Missouri. For further announcements see our religious papers and carefully read the programs that will be sent to all the churches in the state. A. R. Spicer, Mrs. J. C. Stanley, our deaconess of Booneville, and her husband, a Baptist-Christian, entertained us nicely during a week's meeting recently conducted in their town.

Bro. J. H. Steinberger and his wife are recent gains to the faithful at Iuka. They were true fellowworkers in the meeting of a few weeks ago. They are ready for any good work. This small congregation is trying now to raise the last payment due the Church Extension Board. "Debt is the devil."

The church at Guntown is one of the best of small congregations. They rejoce in the coming to them of Bro. Stubblefield and his excellent family.

G. A. Reynolds is comfortably housed in the new parsonage at McComb City. He preaches there and at other points.

The writer was sent as a delegate to the C. E. convention at Meridian. He stopped on the way and preached two sermons at West Point. Prof. G. A. Macon, our Sunday-school superintendent, entertained royally. The West Point congregation has recently sustained the loss of two of the very best and most active members. "God buries his workmen, but his work goes on."

About the middle of July our preachers all over the Southland will begin their midsummer campaign in the small towns and in the country of revival meetings. Readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, pray for the success of these men who go forth bearing the Word of truth, "and on my behalf, that uttterance may be given unto me in opening my mouth, to make known with boldness the mystery of the gospel." I say with you, "Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields, that they are white already unto harvest." "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few. Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that he send forth laborers into his harvest." Let him that soweth and him that reapeth rejoice together. Let us not grow weary in well-doing, fo in due season we SHALL REAP. JAMES H. BROOKS.

From the Iowa Secretary.

THE I. C. C. CAMPAIGN.

DEAR BRETHREN:—The summer campaign is pon us. Believing thot the brotherhood of Iowa will support us, we are planning an advance all along the line. The summer is the only time we can hold meetings in some of our most promising fields. In Northern Iowa we have arranged to hold meetings at Vinton, Oelwein, Garrison and Iowa Falls in the northeast district, and Fort Dodge, Kamrar and other points in the northwest district, and Greenfield in the southwest district. All but Oelwein are new points and at each place a tabernacle must be erected. These are open doors and we are laying our plans to enter four of them between now and July 15.

The northeast and northwest districts will have an evangelist. While the southeast and southwest districts have not arranged to employ district evangelists, they will not fall behind in this campaign.

We are arranging now. for a successful evangelist to open up a new field in the southwest district. We will have five evangelists at work in as many new fields before July 20.

We look to the preachers for help to sustain this work. Without it this campaign must fail. Our faith in you has led us to make this advance move and we feel confident that you will not fail us. We earnestly covet your prayers and co-operation. Do not hesitate to ask your people for money for Iowa. We have 15 counties, 38 county-seats, 1,500 towns and almost one thousand struggling congregations that appeal to us for sympathy and help. Many of these are important centers and promise us great results for the money and labor expended.

Tell your church of the golden harvest that awaits us. Preach a sermon on "Iowa as a Mission Field." Make a personal canvass of the membership. Do not be satisfied with you apportionment. Send it and as much more as you can to W. W. Williams, Treas.

If you know of a promising new field or church wanting a meeting, report it to me. Give all the information you can concerning each. Report all vacant pulpits in your vicinity.

Fill out and return statistic blanks as soon after receiving them as you can. Send any information at your command that will advance the cause of Christ in Iowa. We have only two and one-half months of the missionary year left. We have no time to lose. Let us work and pray for increased faith, courage and liberal ability. B. S. DENNY,

Sec. I. C. C.

Washington Convention.

The Western Washington Christian Convention, held in Seattle, May 30, 31 and June 1, was an unqualified success. The attendance was not large, but the addresses were of a high order and the utmost unanimity and good will prevailed. B. H. Lingenfelter, of Tacoma, presided over the sessions with ease and impartiality. The feature of the opening session Tuesday evening was a splendid address by W. S. Crockett, of New Whatcom, on the subject, "A Jubilee in Missions."

Wednesday morning's session was opened with a symposium on "Strategic Points in Western Washington;" J. S. McCallom, on Olympia; John Young, on Everett; R. M. Messick, on Kelsoe; W. S. Crockett, on New Whatcom; J. N. Smith, on Seattle; G. D. King, on Montezuma; B. H. Lingenfelter, on Tacoma. The burden of these addreses was a hard work a hopeful outlook for great growth. The subject, "Supreme Needs of Western Washington," was then treated by R. M. Messick and H. W. Powers. The need of personal consecration and loyalty to the truth was given special emphasis. The business session of the C. W. B. M. occupied the rest of the morning session. Mrs. Goble presided. Mrs. M. K. Sackett, of Seattle, gave a very appropriate opening address which was followed by a timely response from Mrs. N. E. Ebert, of Tacoma.

After some miscellaneous business and the appointment of committees the convention repaired for lunch.

The afternoon session was opened with a discussion on "Revivals," led by D. B. Garrison, of Olymyia, followed bo Bros. King, Kimmel, Sapp, Kinney, Fletcher, Crockett and Messick, perseenting in a forcible manner the various qualifications for a good revival. This was followed by a very interesting and helpful address on the theme, "The Sunday-school as an Evangelizing Agency," by W. C. Merrett, superintendent of the State Sunday-school Union. State Evangelist Sapp then presented briefly the claims of the Pacific Christian and urgad upon the brethren the obligation of its support.

The evening session was taken up by an address from Ira W. Kimmel, of North Yokima, on the subject, "The C. E. as an Evangelizing Agency." He spoke from personal experience in C. E. work, emphasizing the mutual and helpful relation between pastor and society. The address was good.

The session Thursday morning was opened with the reports of committees and brief business session, and was followed by the closing number of the program, "Our Missionary Days." "The Day for Foreign Missions," by Ira W. Kimmel; "The Day for Home Missions," by W. S. Crockett; "The Day for Church Extension," by D. B. Garrison; "Forefathers' Day," by M. C. Lane; "Day for Ministerial Relief, by W. M. Kinney; "Day for State Work," by F. B. Sapp. This discussion was among the best features of the program.

J. S. McCallom, of Olympia, was unable to fill his places on the program, on account of throat trouble, to the regret of all present.

Prof. A. C. Schobs, of New Whatcom, conducted the song service of the convention with great credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of all. A rising vote of thanks was given chairman Lingenfelter for the able and impartial manner in which he had presided over the sessions. Bro. R. M. Messick pronounced the benediction, and thus closed a season of soul-refreshing and spiritual feasting never to be forgotten.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S PRAYER MEETING and Its Improvement.

BY CAL ODBURN.

This book is the offspring of experience and observation, setting forth how to make the Young People's Prayer-Meetings most interesting and profitable. It has been written, not for the young people of the past, but for those of the present and future—not for the experienced, but for the inexperienced; "and now, little book, may God bless your mission of usefulness to the young men and young women, to the boys and to the girls who have pledged themselves to be loyal to Christ and the Church."

Sunday-School Literature

THE matter of Sunday-school Literature is one of very great importance. For, whether it should be so or not, the fact is that the character of the instruction given in nine-tenths of the Sunday-school classes throughout the country is determined by the contents of the Lesson Helps they use. This being true, and the fact that first impressions are most lasting, how important that Pastors and Superintendents of Christian Sunday-schools see that their Schools are supplied with Christian Periodicals. If the children are taught that one church is as good as another, that certain divine commands are of little or no importance, or can be changed or set aside by man, what effect will it have on the church of the future? "Think on these things."

We understand a FEW of our schools are using sectarian or union (so called) supplies, in order to save a few cents each quarter. Are you one of that number? Samples of our Supplies sent free.

KANSAS.

Bouner Springs, June 19.—Six baptized at Edwardsville on the 11th inst., and two by statement.—J. M. MICHAEL.

FLORIDA.

Jacksonville, June 12.—There were seven confessions yesterday; six young men and one young lady.—J. T. BOONE.

MISSOURI.

Joplin, June 11.—Six additions by letter today; eight since last report; 50 since Jan. 1. Our Bible-school had 226 present this morning and authorized me to pledge $25 at Plattsburg for state work. This has been the greatest day in the church since we came to Joplin.—W. F. TURNER

Rockport, June 17. — A few days since I closed a short meeting at North Star, which resulted in two additions. My work all continues nicely.—S. W. GLASCOCK.

MINNESOTA.

Worthington, June 11.—Our meeting has just closed by smallpox scare. Was doing finely. Six additions the last night. We have added quite a number here by letter, statement and confession, and from other churches. The sects have fought us bitterly. This and the continued rainy weather have given us a hard pull, yet our work was a success here. Eld. Atwood did practical work. We spend a few days in service at Dundee before our next meeting.—F. HOWARD SWEETMAN.

CALIFORNIA.

Eureka, June 7.—Preached the memorial sermon; subject, "The Hero of Heroes." Recently delivered a series of sermons to young men. Six have been added. One a lawyer, by obidence.—S. A. NESBIT.

Marysville, June 12.—Two accessions here yesterday at the regular services. In the morning a Baptist lady united with us. In the evening a little boy confessed the Savior, and was baptize this afternoon. Our attendance is speedily increasing, notwithstanding the hot weather.—L. B. COGGINS.

ILLINOIS.

Clinton, June 16. — Fourteen confessions, two otherwise, in a nine days' meeting in a country schoolhouse.—E. A. GILLILAND.

Rossville, June 8.—Two were baptized at West Liberty on last Lord's day.—T. L. STIPP.

Normal, June 13.—Five added recently.—E. B. BARNES.

Center Point, June 18.—Two confessions today and expecting others soon.—C. F. GARNAR.

Sangamon, June 19.—The meeting still continues; 17 additions up to date; 15 by baptism.—JOHN G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

Sullivan, June 19.—Large increase in the Sunday-school yesterday also in church attendance, and three accessions.—E. W. BRECHERT, pastor.

INDIANA.

Franklin, June 12.—Three added at Hartsville at our regular meeting; one by letter, one reclaimed and one by baptism.—WILLIS M. CUNNINGHAM.

Zionsville, June 14. — One confession at Omega last Sunday. Will preach two funerals and deliver a class address to Township graduates this week.—WM. H. KNOTTS.

The Combs-Hunsaker meeting at Monroe City is nearly two weeks old, with 36 added. They dedicated the new house of worship Sunday, June 4th, free from debt, with money to spare. They go to their homes for a few weeks' vacation at the close of their present engagement.

Corunna, June 19.—One addition by baptism at the Cedar Lake Church of Christ.—JOHN J. HIGGS, pastor.

It is the duty of parents to place good literature before the young of their families. The following books are well adapted for use by the young people of the present time. Any one of these will exert a grand and noble influence on the minds of the careful readers:

"Plain Talks to Young Men on Vital Issues," by Peter Ainslie. Price, 60 cents.

"King Saul," by J. Breckenridge Ellis. Price, $1.00.

"Queen Esther," by M. M. Davis. Price, 75 cents.

"In the Days of Jehu," by J. Breckenridge Ellis. Price, 75 cents.

"Mary Ardmore, or A Test of Faith," by J. H. Stark. Price, $1.00.

MEN OF YESTERDAY

A Series of Character Sketches of Prominent Men Among the Disciples of Christ.

BY THOMAS W. GRAFTON.

Author of "Life of Alexander Campbell."

This volume contains biographical sketches of Walter Scott, Barton W. Stone, John Smith, Isaac Errett, B. W. Johnson and Otis A. Burgess.

The essential facts in the lives of these men are told in an attractive style. This volume meets the demand for information concerning these worthy men, presented brief enough to be read and appreciated by readers of to-day.

TESTIMONIALS.

"Men of Yesterday" is written in that pleasing style that made the "Life of Alexander Campbell," by the same author, so greatly admired. It would be an especially good book to put into the hands of young people. The narratives are full of interest, and these are men with whom the generation now growing up should have some acquaintance."—Peter Ainslie, Editor Christian Tribune, Baltimore, Md.

"The men mentioned in 'Men of Yesterday' are worthy of these sketches and the sketches are worthy of the men. Their histories will inspire noble lives in others. These sketches are not long enough to be wearisome, and not so brief as to be unsatisfactory. The author is happy in his chosen field, happy in the title of the book and happy in the treatment of his subject."—M. M. Davis, Dallas, Tex.

The Christian's Wish.

[The following Bible poem was sent to us by Sister N. M. Adams, of Rutland, Mass. Her father copied it in the year 1824.]

Daniel's wisdom may I know,
Stephen's faith and spirit show;
John's divine communion feel,
Moses' meekness, Joshua's zeal;
Run like the unwearied Paul—
Win the day and conquer all.

Mary's love may I posses,
Lydia's tender-heartedness,
Peter's ardent spirit feel;
James' faith by works reveal;
Like young Timothy, may I
Every sinful passion fly.

Job's submission let me show,
David's true devotion know,
Samuel's call, O may I hear,
Lazarus' happy portion share;
Let Isaiah's hallowed fire
All my new-born soul inspire.

Mine be Jacob's wrestling prayer,
Gideon's valiant steadfast care;
Joseph's purity impart,
Isaac's meditative heart,
Abraham's friendship let me prove,
Faithful to the God of love.

Most of all, may I pursue
That example Jesus drew;
In my life and conduct show
How He lived and walked below;
Day by day His grace restored,
Imitate my perfect Lord.

Lottie.

[The following tribute to an only child, written by the father, one of our faithful, industrious preachers, will touch the hearts of many of our Family Circle readers, because of fellow feelings that we have for one another in these deep sorrows.—EDITOR.]

It is the old, old story. You are with your wife in the dark and trying hour; and out of the deep thou comest, darling child. A new voice is heard, a new life is thrown upon the shore of life's sea. You are a father now, your wife a mother, you have a new revelation, you are bound by a new tie. You call your darling Charlotte May, or Lottie. "And the child grew and waxed strong in spirit, and the grace of God was upon it;" and love has a new purpose, life a new meaning.

A year passes, and a year is passing, and your baby runs about in its play and calls your name and fills the house with its laugh and prattle. At night it says its little prayer, "Now I lay me down to sleep." Again, your little one can read, and it loves stories and it can sing, and it sings the "Rock of Ages." It goes to Sunday-school and church and sings with its mother, and after service you lead or carry your little one home.

Lottie is eight now, and she goes to school and learns many things; she is ten, and plays the piano and writes pieces for the paper, and you are proud to see her name. Again, you are preaching, and when you give the invitation, Lottie comes forward, and leads the way, and others follow, and they all make the good confession, "I believe," and you baptize them, a dozen little children, and the people are standing around, and some have happy faces, and some seem to cry. It is your only child and you say, "Lottie, I baptize you." Then you receive them, those little children, into the church. "Let the little ones come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Your daughter is fifteen, and you look upon her with pride. With her you have traveled; you have been in different states; you have taken her to the city; her mother has taken her to the mountains; you have talked, played, prayed, sung and cried together many times. She is in the high school; she has studied the sciences; she is reading German; she has studied music under excellent teachers, and the piano is learning to yield up to her its sweetest notes.

And now you are going from home for a time. At night you all pray for one another—you three—and you sing sweet songs and say, "Goodnight." The next morning you walk with her part of the way to school. She is past fifteen; she is almost a woman, with a woman's ways, and is modest, hopeful, beautiful. She is standing in life's early morning; her feet brush the dews, and her face is like the morning. Strange fancies play over her mind; she is where the brook meets the river. You look down upon her hopeful face, and blue eyes and golden hair and say, "God bless you," and kiss her farewell.

You are gone six weeks; in two more you will return. The winter is past, the warm spring has come, and with it the voice of birds. So, too, your greatest trials now are past and brighter days seem in store for you and yours. You hear that your daughter has had a visit to her grandma's, and such a good time, and that she has had a beautiful dream of the better land, and seen angels and white waters and fair flowers. You are at rest in a stranger's home, and at midnight you hear a knock at the door, and a voice, and you are called; it is the fatal messenger boy with his telegram, "Lottie is very sick; come at once." The arrow has entered your soul. In half an hour you are on the train, but the distance is long, and you must wait some hours at the connection of the trains, and you feel that the waiting time, my brother, is the saddest time of all.

At length you are at home and your wife is weeping. "What ails the child?" you ask. "It is the cerebro-spinal meningetis, or spotted fever, and there is little hope!" Then you sit down by your dear one; soon she awakes and sees you: "Oh, papa, I am so glad you are come," and she throws her fevered arms around you. She sleeps the fitful sleep of the dying. Again she awakes and says, "Oh papa, ain't you sorry for me? Mamma, ain't you sorry for me?" "Yes, darling, and we are right here by you and will be with you all the time." Earlier, she had counted up all her dear friends, and calling their names said, "I have so many darlings." Again, she had said, "Jesus is the same, yesterday, to-day and forever; why don't he take me to his home on high?"

She is now all unconscious; she is fording the river and struggling with the breakers. For hours you hold her dying hand and watch the fleeting breath. Darkness has sealed her vision, her senses are stealing away. Still you are by her, you and her mother. Others are near at hand, but you two are by her. She is crossing the bar; she is going far out to see. What angels hover around her, God only knows; what a light appears to her in the dark valley falls not upon our eyes, blinded with tears. Did she hear a voice saying, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee"—the voice of the Shepherd who carries the lambs in his bosom—and who said, "Let the little ones come unto me?"

She came and went in the night, the earliest hours of the new day. For fifteen years, three months and eight days she journeyed with us and then she passed to where, beyond these voices, there is peace. Our darling was gone—our only child—and we were alone, and the silent stars looked down upon us. The third day we buried Lottie. From friends at home and in distant states came messages of love and floral offerings. She had many friends, and kindly they remembered her. We placed her in a beautiful casket, white like her soul, and on its silver plate inscribed her name "Lottie." Then a grave was made among the graves, and we placed her in her "low green tent, whose curtains never outward swing." The flowers she loved covered her grave, and we went our lonely way without her.

"The old, old fashion. The fashion that came in with our first parents, and will last, unchanged, until our race has run its course, and the wide firmament is rolled up like a scroll; the old, old fashion—death. Oh, thank God, all who see it, for the older fashion yet of immortality, and look upon us as angels of young children, with regards not quite estranged, when the swift current bears us to the ocean."

When Lottie was a little past four, we taught her some lines from Wordsworth's "Intimations of Immortality," and she spoke them in an exhibition at Carbondale, Ill. From time to time, as she grew older, we had her repeat them until at length she came to see their beauty:

"Hence in a season of calm weather,
Though inland far we be,
Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
Which brought us hither,
Can in a moment journey thither,
And see the children sport upon the shore,
And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore."

Let us believe that she sports upon the shore and plays upon a harp and has her high place in the kingdom of glory.

The Dignity of Labor.

To say that "genius is the capacity for taking infinite pains" is to go far wide of the truth. Nevertheless, it has been proved a thousand times and more that genius is worth little in the world unless the capacity for work goes with it. The autobiography of every man who has won fame and fortune might be written as a mere variation of the word labor. One of the lessons that the cheerful and courageous Stevenson has handed down to us is the joy and the holiness of labor. To the last his pen was in his hand. Sickness could not make him falter: death only could drive him from his task. And the burden of his song always was, "Do something!"

Infinite pains! Success of any kind demands that penalty. And the reward of success itself lies rather in the doing than in any compensation the world can give.—Denver Republican.

Mother.

We had the funniest story
In our paper t'other day,
About a mule and buggy
That scared and run away.
I liked to die a-laughin',
And so did pa and Josh,
But mother couldn't stop to hear—
She was busy with the wash.

Last week we had a picnic
Out to Mechanicsville;
I went with 'Lizy Fergus,
And pa took Jen and Bill;
The time we had a-funnin'
Would beat a story-book,
But mother couldn't go along—
She had preserves to cook.

On Monday was the m'nag'ry;
We had a glorious time
A-seein' beasts and serpents
And birds of every clime;
We went in bright and early
To see the show go round,
But mother stayed at home to sew
On Jen's alpacky gownd.

Last fall when all the Rankins
Came down to stay a week,
We went one day for walnuts
'Way out on Sugar Creek:
We took our dinner with us
And stayed the whole day through,
But mother couldn't get away—
The scrubbin' was to do.

To-morrow night's the concert;
I said I'd go with Jen
And Bill and 'Lizy Fergus
And Sairey True, but then
After I'd done and said it
The thought of mother came;
She never gets a holiday
That's halfway worth the name.

She's lookin' worn and weary,
And it occurred to me
To send her to the concert,
If only she'll agree;
I'll stay and do the dishes,
No odds if Jen does coax,
For mother needs a little fun,
The same as other folks.

Rights of the People Who Don't Like Us.

People who do not like us have doubtless missed a great opportunity—so, at least, it is perfectly natural for us to feel. Whether they ever realize how much they have lost depends a great deal, however, on our manner of treating the situation, and it can hardly be said that our natural method of dealing with it is very likely to better things. We may suspect that the only way to have such people ever come to like us is to cordially recognize their right not to. It is one thing to like to be liked, a quite natural and proper feeling; but, unless we watch ourselves, we soon find that we are demanding that people shall like us as one of our birthrights in this world, which is quite a different matter. One of the wisdoms which comes latest in life is the discovery that there is nothing fundamentally wrong in people's not liking us.

What entirely different attitudes different men assume when they discover dislike toward themselves! One man gets angry, and proposes to retaliate; he will return dislike with worse dislike. Sometimes he will preposterously go to work to make people like him. Another sees that this is not a matter about which he can properly do anything, or, if there is anything to be done, he goes at it by the short cut of doing it to himself. It is told of Jowett, Master of Balliol, who was very slow to let people know whether he liked them, that he was once talking with a nephew who was something of a stranger to him, and trying the meanwhile to make out what was in the fellow. In the course of conversation, the nephew made the casual remark that, when a man insulted him, he always made it a point to ask him to dinner. "You'll do, you'll do!" joyously shouted the master, who felt that, after this evidence of social maturity, he need not worry about his nephew. While most of us may find it inconvenient to go as far as the dinner point with antagonistic people, we can at least recognize that many of them are thoroughly worthy of a good dinner, and give them the next best thing, which is a little extra politeness.

It is to be feared that many people are making like and dislike the whole story of their life. Hence they never see anything as it is. It was never put into the structure of the world that everybody should like us, or, for that matter, that any one man should have an unlimited share of the favor of others. And so the man who sees in dislike nothing but a personal misfortune misses the fact that repulsion, as well as attraction, is a great institute of nature. The world is chemical, not mechanical; and it is not for us to dovetail all sorts of things together, but to learn to respect the repulsions, distances and aversions which have a beneficent place in it. One of the greatest tyrannies in the world is to see life and everything in it in the purely personal way, as it happens to be related to us, and so gradually lose sight of great principles because of little personalities. That another man's tastes and temper keep him separate from us is not in itself a thing to be quarreled with. The point is to know how to be separate and sin not.

Never was there a more wholesome recognition of this beneficent ordinance of dislike than that accorded it by Charles Lamb. He, for one, though he confessed that he immensely liked to be liked, seems never to have been in doubt as to the full rights of the people who did not like him. He was generous enough to suspect that it was no particular fault of theirs, and that forces over which they had no control had a hand in it. His action the night his play was first produced, when he, who loved his work more than most men, joined gleefully in the demonstration by which the audience rejected it, might well have kept many a fit of madness from doing its worst. Trying at different times to like Scotchmen and finally giving it up as something not to be, he rendered his dislike classical by the sweetness of his acknowledgment that no Scotchman ever liked him, or, so far as he knew, had ever made the attempt to.

No, the man who works only on the basis of being liked has chosen the impossible. Whether the world likes us or not, it is, as a rule, quite willing that we go on and do our work, and it can hardly be blamed for not quite knowing whether it likes us till we have shown what sort of workmen we are. "What do we want to be liked for?" ought to be a main question with us all.

We become more rationally and quietly disposed to the people who don't like us when we come to know a little better some of those who do. When we find how prone some of our admirers are to take up with a poor article in other directions, that it is not wholly on account of their sanity or clearness that they took up with us and that they often admire us for the worst there is in us, there begins to dawn on us a slow respect for the excellent judgment of some of those who kept away from us till we should bring forth something better. Far more humiliating oftentimes are the self-discoveries we make through some of our admirers than those made through folks who stand off from us. He has lived to little purpose who has taken no warning from some of the favor that has come to him.

The farther we go into this matter the more we shall realize that to those who do not take to us belong not only "rights" and tolerance, but also a good degree of gratitude; for there are some virtues which are hardly to be gotten into us save through just these people. For the average run of mankind it would seem that about the only chance for them to ever get themselves into any perspective is to have some one dislike them. They may, at the first, smart under the experience, and purpose many foolish retaliations; but their minds will gradually cool off into curiosity as to the dislike, until there dawns on them what others have been seeing in them for years, and, seeing this, they wonder, with a silent gratitude, how people ever put up with them as long as they have.

There are many souls on whose horizon this cloud fearing dislike needs to be reduced to about the size of a man's hand before they can ever do any good work. It is an incident of life, and never the whole story, though living as we do in a time of crowds, with the word "social" so constantly in our ears, it is no wonder that we are all unduly sensitive of what people think of us. Never was there a greater need to practice the arts of loneliness. When we hear of such a man as Dean Church saying of so great a man as Archbishop Tait, "I never could like him, but, take him all in all, I think he was the fittest man in the church to occupy the position he did," we get the right proportions of the whole matter. Dean Church had rights, and Tait would have been the first to recognize them. Great souls always have this quality of freedom from vindictiveness, and of loving their work more than they do themselves. They are not only reconciled to the spaces that are set between the temperaments, but they see the beneficence of the arrangement. The great soul of Lincoln seemed to have a certain pleasure in the variety which came from having counselors who did not like him. Could we organize our own world, all this variety and richness would be gone. The world is well planned. Let us fall in with it more cordially, and annex more of that rich but rejected territory of the excellent people who do not like us.—Sunday-school Times.

Danger.

Write it on the workhouse gate,
Write it on the schoolboy's slate,
Write on the copy book,
That the young may often look,
"Where there's drink, there's danger."

Write it on the churchyard mound,
Where the rum-slain dead are found,
Write it on the gallows high,
Write for all the passers-by,
"Where there's drink, there's danger."

Write it in the nation's laws,
Blotting out the license clause,
Write it on each ballot white,
So it can be read aright,
"Where there's drink, there's danger."

Write it on our ships that sail,
Borne along by storm and gale,
Write it large in letters plain,
Over every land and main,
"Where there's drink, there's danger."

Write it over every gate,
On the church and halls of state,
In the heart of every band,
On the laws of every land,
"Where there's drink, there's danger."

Happy Marriages.

EFFIE BARTLEY HOWARD.

Are there any things in life more real than love and marriage? Can there be anything more sacred than these divinely appointed ordinances?

Yet, so few understand it that we are daily hearing of unhappy marriages where there need be no cause for sorrow. A husband and wife, to enjoy real love, should be all in all to each other; they should have no secrets, but trust and confidence in each other to the fullest extent. So many young married people look upon marriage too lightly and keep as much apart in confidences as if they were mere acquaintances. They fail to view it as the most sacred and solemn thought of their lives; for what can be greater or higher than giving one's self to another? It should be our highest aim, for it is from God, and all we that enter should do so with our hearts full and running over with love for each other. Our hearts and lives should be like an open book for each to read and understand. Too many husbands and wives are unacquainted with each other, and this should not be.

As the acquaintance with a friend should begin to grow with the first meeting, so should it be with young married people. It is one of their first duties to know each other thoroughly; the faults as well as the good qualities. They should love each other so strongly that they only see the good side of the other and not expect too much, far with patience and years of experience they will grow more fitted for their life work and the responsible duties they hold as husband and wife.

Their lives should not be selfish ones, for they should try to build up and encourage those about them, who are less fortunate than themselves. They should forget themselves in the one thought of doing good and giving help and cheer to the unfortunate of all classes.

It is that "perfect love that casteth out fear," that charity that "seeketh not her own," which brings the blessing unsought and unexpected.

Those who only see the dark side of life are never happy, nor do they enjoy perfect love for each other.

Among our neighbors and friends we can find one happy couple in ten if we try, but should not seek out those who are unhappy and listen to their dark portrayal of married life. Rather try to help them, if in our power, to make their lives lighter, and we will thus find our own life brighter. It takes so little exertion to cast forth a ray of brightness for others. A cheery word or a smile, some kind act willingly done, will make many a heart happier. The love of wife for husband or husband for wife should be the same. A wife or husband in speaking of their love for each other should be able to say: "It is real, it is true, pure and divine. We are entirely one, and live for each other." Why cannot all married people possess such love? If they did, how happy the world would be! Why did God give us such divine love for each other, but that we might help others to realize the secret of marital happiness?

We know we fall short in many duties; try every day to do better. Our love for each other grows stronger every day, and we are happier as we progress in life.

"Life is what we make it," but it seems as if we did not try hard enough to make life as happy as we might, although we are so happy together. Why are we happy when so many couples are around us are apparently miserable? Is it that we are blind or selfish and cannot see or feel how unhappy some people are? Every day of our lives we should be more thankful that God has given each to the other.

The little cares and worries of life when we are unwell fade away in each other's company. Oh for more of such marriages, such heaven-sent blessings, that the world might grow less despondent and human nature be lifted to the pleasure that an all-wise Creator intended.

Then would there be less selfishness and cynicism in the world and the days of the millennium be near—even at the door.

Giving and Getting.

One of life's paradoxes is that he who gives gets. The way to success is by surrender. They who are most lavish of their own life are the ones into whose lap the world pours the richest treasures. Thousands of hearts are starving to-day simply because they are stingy. They have withheld themselves, and in the withholding have grown lean and poor. The fat and prosperous soul is the one which is liberal with itself; which offers itself as food and strength to every needy man and cause. There is no secret for greatness like the secret of giving—constant and unsparing giving of self's best.

Not they who seek to get—to gather to themselves the world's best things and thus find satisfaction—but they who bountifully offer themselves in sympathy and service to the world, learn life's deepest joy.

How shall young men and young women secure greatest success? Simply by offering themselves on the altar of the world's every-day needs. Largeness of life, fineness of character, honor of the honorable, love of all, will crowd toward the young person who unselfishly labors to serve men through commonplace days and weary nights. In ways humble and high, by means insignificant and great, give up your best talents and to all whom you can by any means help, and reward in time and eternity is certain.—Forward.

A Christian Fourth of July.

The birthday of a Christian nation of more than seventy millions deserves a worthy celebration. The present method of celebrating it is almost barbarous, not to say heathenish. It seems to be going from bad to worse—noise and confusion of all sorts all the night preceding, and more noise and confusion all through the day and evening. It takes about thirty hours of continuous bedlem to celebrate the day. Besides, it is a day devoted to games, shows, sports, theatricals and all sorts of foolish amusements. It may well be asked, Are we, as a people, losing our heads? Is real, genuine patriotism a thing of the past? Have we no care that the young should be reminded of the great facts of our history, of the priceless cost of our institutions, of the perils involved in frivolity, of the duty of each to know the full significance of the times in which we live?

We need, we must have, a reform in the method of observing our nation's birthday. Is it not possible for Christian people, for all good people, to unite in consecrating this day to the promotion of the temperance reform? There never was a time when there was more need of forming and encouraging a right moral sentiment in regard to the sale and use of intoxicants than now. We are coming to find that no law, however good and beneficial, can be enforced unless it is supported by the moral sentiment of a considerable majority of the people. How shall the moral sentiment be secured so that laws may be enacted and executed for the suppression of the saloon? Certainly by training our young people to be total abstainers, and also to be the relentless enemies of the saloon.

Why, then, should we not set apart the Fourth of July to instruct all our people, and especially our children and youth, in lessons of Christian patriotism? Why not show them that the most dreadful enemy of our homes and our native land is the saloon? Why not use all suitable means to enlist them for life in the supreme effort to destroy the saloon?—Selected.

Tobacco.

Tobacco is an evil weed, though many people choose it;
They roll it into plug and snuff, and then proceed to use it.
They cut it, hang it, bulk it down,
Whenever it is ripe, sir,
And make it into cut-and-dried,
And smoke it in their pipe, sir.
They make it into cigarette and stogies and cigars, sir,
And when a boy begins to smoke, he'll surely see the stars, sir.
But when he learns to chew and spit, and smoke
the cigarette, sir,
He thinks he is quite a man, and that you well
may bet, sir.
The ladies, too, will soil their teeth by using up the snuff, sir,
Or take their pipe and cut-and-dried, and surely make it puff, sir.
When you go out to see your friends, unless you surely quit, sir,
They have to make you room to spit as well as room to sit, sir.
If you go on the train to ride, they'll make you take the smoker,
Where men can chew, and smoke, and drink,
play seven-up and poker.
It spoils the breath and dulls the mind,
Brings heart disease and cancer,
Destroys the nerves, infects the lungs,
And ruins any man, sir.
Then cleanse yourself, as God hath said,
From filthiness of flesh, sir,
And let the blessed sunshine in
To bloom your soul afresh, sir.
Your heart will then be purified,
According to his Word, sir,
And you will have a cleaner mouth
To glorify the Lord, sir.

The Automobile as a Reformer.

There is one point in the introduction of the automobile which is not generally noted, and that is the effect of the vehicle upon the human character. The automobile as a moral agent is not recognized, yet it is easy to see the influence it will exert upon one of the most evil tendencies in human nature—cruelty.

Any one who has ever ridden and suffered in a horse car, a horse car going uphill in bad weather, has appreciated the change to an electric motor. The driver of the horse car has always before him two living creatures, captives to his bow and spear, as it were—at least to his bit and rein; and the only means whereby his own energy can affect the chariot he is driving is through the brake that checks and the beasts that draw.

Thwarted energy always irritates—which is only another way of saying that friction produces heat; and where the means of promoting the activity of your motive power is by hurting it, there is a constant temptation to turn pain to speed. The motorman has no whip. It does no good to his battery to kick it. If his machinery does not work to suit him, he has to use a more complex tool than a club and more patience than profanity. He may be at the start no gentler man than was the driver when he started; but the process of running an engine develops different qualities from the process of driving a horse, and they differ most in this—that there is no room for cruelty.

The cab-driver is as good an instance as the car-driver. He "sits up aloft" in most uncherubic guise; and far below is his four-legged motor, whose own desires lead him to seek much-needed rest rather than prolonged exercise. But the "fare" desires speed, the driver desires pay, and the mechanical connection between desire and execution is a long, stinging whip. The horse, being smitten smartly in his tenderer parts, responds with increased speed, and the daily habit of using pain as a motive power naturally develops that indifference to pain in others, even pleasure in inflicting it. This we call cruelty.

Not so the director of an automobile. He may not smite his motor. If he does, it has no result in speed, and may cost money in repairs. His own desire to produce speed that his patrons may reward him now tends to develop skill and accuracy in managing his motor and patience in adjusting his own uncertain forces to the steady power beneath him. He is dealing with the law of physics now, not seeking to coerce an intervening will.

The use of mechanical motors for our city traffic will raise the moral standard of the whole community. We shall all be nobler when the whip is utterly outgrown. —Charlotte Perkins Stetson, in the Saturday Evening Post.

Lessons of the Flowers.

"Nothing teaches us so much in this world as flowers, if we will only watch them, understand the messages they exhalt, and profit by them," writes Edward W. Bok, in the April Ladies' Home Journal. "I wish every body on this earth might love flowers. Flowers can do so much for a man or a woman. No one can raise flowers, live among them, love them and not be better for their influence. By their birth they show us how; out of things hard, out of disappointment and failure, by the overcoming of obstacles and the bending to difficult tasks, creep forth the most beautiful results. By their cultivation they show how different natures need different treatments. By the manner in which they refuse to thrive near weeds they teach the clearest lesson of human association, and show that sin is an intrusion in this world. We learn the great lesson that while the most gorgeous flowers appeal to our admiration, we love the fragrant ones the best. Every lesson, every pleasure, we can learn and derive from these silent messengers of the earth. The flowers speak a universal language; they adapt themselves to grave or gay. A flower is never misunderstood. We associate flowers with all the joyous seasons of our lives as well. Flowers often speak to us when our own words seem powerless to express what we really mean. They are the daintiest bits of God's handiwork. They call to us to care for them; to love them, rewarding us with prodigality when we respond to their beckoning. The message is divine. Like an April day, 'shadow and sunshine is life.' But so the flowers grow, and 'we come to June by the way of March.'"—Exchange.

How the Fourth of July Should be Celebrated.

BY THE LATE JOHN HALL, D. D.

It is very natural that the people should recall the Declaration of Independence, for it is in that document that the words "United States" first appear. It is true that they appeared in a document drawn up at a meeting of my countrymen, chiefly Presbyterians, a year before in North Carolina, but it was not until 1776 that the Declaration was accepted.

The 121 years [spoken in 1897] through which we have passed since the promulgation of the Declaration of Independence have been marked by steady advancement in religion, science, literature and the general good, and it is eminently fitting that the day should be celebrated in a manner which gives ready acknowledgment of God's goodness to this nation.

I could wish that the day was celebrated in a manner somewhat different from what it is. I think the money spent in buying firecrackers in all parts of the country, which go to the making of useless noise, could be expended in a way that would do a far greater amount of good. It might be employed in the education of those who come to our shores ignorant of the principles of our government and unable to gain that knowledge requisite for good citizens. If the money were spent in this way, I think it would be a more appropriate way of recalling the day.

As Christian citizens there are certain duties incumbent upon us which have to do with the promotion of comfort and prosperity among our fellowbeings. In doing these we should see to it that we are not working in the interest of one or the other of the political parties. All those who have made their homes among us should be taught the value of those principles which go to make up good citizenship, and to use wisely the privileges that are given them. It is the duty of every foreigner coming to this country to become a citizen as soon as practicable. As soon as I could become a citizen of this nation, I availed myself of the opportunity, and never once since I took out my papers have I on election day failed to cast my vote for the candidate for national, state or municipal office who, in my opinion, was best qualified to perform the duties of that office.

Foreigners should be taught to vote for men and principles which conscience declare to be the right, and in this way we can be true to the principles of those who made the celebration of Independence Day possible.—The Preacher's Magazine.

The Advance Society.

Bettie Fowler, Battlefield, Miss., writes: "Please send me full particulars of the Advance Society." I have received the same request several times, and I suspect they are from new subscribers of this paper, who did not read about us at the beginning. It won't hurt to tell it over in a few words. Any one can become a member who makes five resolutions: to read thirty lines of poetry a week; to read five pages of history; to memorize a good quotation every week; to read a verse in the Bible every day, and to keep an account of this work in a notebook. When you have kept all of these resolutions for twelve weeks, send me your name and a report of what you have done, naming books and authors. Then your name will be printed on our Honor List, as many times as you are faithful during a quarter. Books yon are studying in school do not count (but, hurrah! we are not in school, now). You will see, this society is different from others. We don't name particular books and say they have to be read. Just so it's poetry, history and Bible, you are free. There are several advantages in this course. You can make your own choice, and you don't have to buy new books. You know, when times are hard (as they always are), a book is the last thing most people buy, or read, either. When a man begins to economize, he begins on his brains and starves them down to newspaper diet. He saves his stomach for the last resort. And then there's no fee to be paid in this society. What I hate about societies in general are fees. Another feature about the Advance Society is this page, where the children write on various subjects. Here is good news from Cora Scribner, Billfry, Minn.: "We have started a branch society here with nine members: Hazel Pulver (10), Arthur Crandel (14), Mina Spencer (10), Sadie Davidson (12), Grace Scribner (9), and the other names have been printed before. We are going to appoint an officer to read the story in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I have a camera and will send you our pictures after awhile." Good!

Madie Hill, Joplin, Mo.: "I would like to start a band of members in our town. I am reading Dombey and Son. Last winter I won a prize of five dollars by writing a story for a daily newspaper. I fell in love, head first, with the Weston family. I hope to be on the Honor List." Children, there is a moral to that letter. Anybody can write for a paper, and some can get their pieces printed, but it takes genius to get five dollars. And notice the sort of book this young author is reading—one of the best to be had. Ulie H. Stewart, Santa Paula, Cal.: "Our vacation has begun and I am working in the beet fields. The best time I had, last vacation, was when I went to Los Angeles, after the fruit season, and bought me a suit with the money I had made." With best love and wishes to all members." Isn't that pretty good for a boy only twelve years old? Floyd C. Reid, Santiago, Mo.: "School is out. I will put in my vacation helping papa and mamma, and in reading"—three of the very best ways, surely. Mary M. Fitzgerald, Geranium, Neb.: "My brother, Benjamin (11), Freida Rhodes (12) and I (13) ask for admittance. My favorites are the five Leatherstocking Tales, Ivanhoe, Uncle Tom's Cabin, Black Beauty, Oliver Twist, David Copperfield." Ethel M. Taylor, Harlan, Ia.: "I cannot tell how much I enjoy our corner in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I have made me a badge of royal purple ribbon, worked with 'Av. S.' in old gold thread and wear it every place I go." Zela Belle Home, Beloit, Kan.: "Twice I forgot to read my Bible, and I woke up and happened to remember about my verse. Each time I got up and saw the electric lights burning in the streets; so I knew it was not twelve, as they are put out at twelve. I take Our Young Folks and am deeply interested in your continued story, 'A Lost Memory.'" Zela names Enoch Arden, as one of her favorites.

Nelle Campbell, Escondido, Cal.: "I have just finished Old-Fashioned Girl, and think it fine. I have recently read Dombey and Son, and I believe that is the best book I ever read. I am in the eighth grade. We spent a week at the coast last summer and we had a fine time. We had two tents and lived outdoors. I went in bathing every day and had lots of fun. There were a great many people, and they had Sunday-school. It is fine to see the big breakers come rolling in, and it is lots of fun to jump the breakers and the swells. We expect to spend part of this summer at the seaside, and I wish some of the Advance Society who never saw the ocean could go with us." Here are just a few new names: Marvin E. Eaton, Mt. Hope, Wash.; Delta Rosencrans (13), Florence City, Ill.; Clara Wilkins (11), Blue Springs, Neb.; Crystabel Rogers (11), Millie Hanson (12), Cecil, O. Armstrong, La Crosse, Wis.; Inez Elliott, Gower, Mo.; Cora I. (11) and Lydia E. Knox (10), Mission Hill, S. D.; Roy Short (10), Salina, Kan.; Bessie Hopkins (14), Edgerton, Mo.

It has pleased me very much to hear from so many members who like my continued story. Those who have been bored by it will rejoice to learn that there are only two more chapters to appear; and those who like it will please remember that strawberries don't last all the year. You always write as if Jennie and George Weston, and the robber, and little Delight were real persons; and that is the way they seem to me—perhaps, they are. Who can say that they are not living somewhere in this big world which we have the honor, and I think I may add, the pleasure of inhabiting? It may be that at some time—a distant one It hink—I will write another story, about Tattie and the Westons and Delight and all the others. I might put some narrow escapes in it and a few dark nights, and may be a runaway horse and a house on fire. You will please remember that the wicked old woman who made Delight beg for her and her husband was not caught and put in jail. She might steal to the Weston's some night when the moon was nowhere and kidnap the sleeping child. Well, I don't know what the next story will be about. Anyway, as I said, there are only two more chapters of the present tale to be unfolded. They will come next week and the week after, and they will tell how everything "turned out."

But what subject would you like to write about next time? I'd like to have some stories of narrow escapes, that are true. Who will write me an account of a Narrow Escape? I mean an escape from some kind of danger. You must all know or have heard of an occasion when somebody came pretty near having a serious accident. Novels are full of narrow escapes; but is real life? I don't believe it. People in real life don't go out and have a narrow escape, a thrilling adventure, every day and then come to dinner. But in every life there are at least a few thrilling moments, when it looked like something was going to happen, only generally it didn't. Write to me about it, and let us see if we cannot get up an exciting page. But if this subject don't suit you, write on any other you have not yet written on; as, Pets, Favorite Books, Funny True Stories, Best Vacations, etc. But I'd rather have a narrow escape.

If any of you think this Advance Society is failing in interest, please observe the new names of our HONOR LIST: Virginia Winn, Dover, Mo.; Zela B. Home, Ulie H. Stewart (second quarter), Della E. Durham, Arbela, Mo.; Nelle Campbell, Floyd C. Reid (second quarter), Ethel M. Taylor (second quarter), Cora Scribner, Madge Master, Ozark, Ark., (second quarter); Emily Rice, Enfield, Ill.; Vetura Blanche Collings, Raytown, Mo.; Helen Ross, Independence, Mo.; Carl C. Taylor, Harlan, Ia.

"I see that Russia has completed plans for a railroad in China," remarked the morose citizen.

"Well, that doesn't affect our personal interests," replied the personal friend.

"No. But I can't help sympathizing with other people when they get into trouble. I'd certainly hate to be the man whose business it is to stand on the platform and call off the stations."

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

SEEN IN RETROSPECT*

In the lessons of the past quarter three distinct phases of Jesus' work appear. There was first the closing portion of that public ministry in which he had sought to teach men his own nature and that of the kingdom he proclaimed, and which may be called the work of the greater part of his life. In this period of his ministry there is first in this quarter the story of Lazarus' rising from the dead. It was a work of sympathy and love on the part of Jesus. He purposely waited the issue of his friend's sickness, and then came that he might minister comfort to the grieving sisters and then bring to them the consolation of restored life. The influence of Jesus always lightens the dread and despair which death brings, and changes the customs which under paganism only increased the gloom of bereavement, to the deep satisfaction of those whose sorrow is lightened and transfigured by a glorious hope. The voice of Jesns brought Lazarus to life, and evermore that voice is calling the dead world to a new life, a new power and a new happiness. Less public, though still somewhat in the circle of the outer world, was the supper at Bethany—a feast of joy for the restored life of Lazarus. Jesus sat as the guest of honor with his friend at his side. It was this occasion which Mary siezed to pour forth, not only the ointment from the alabaster box, but the still richer treasure of her devotion regardless of criticisms as to the waste. She had but one thought and that was gratitude. Even here, however, there was a plot, not against Jesus directly, but against Lazarus. Even those around the Master were in danger. At last, therefore, as is seen in the third lesson, Jesus withdrew entirely into the circle of the twelve. In this course of events John has shown us what was the true character of Jesus' ministry; first to the world, and then, when rejected, wholly to the disciples, to prepare them for that work which should outlast his own. But even in this inner circle there were disturbing elements, and not until Judas had gone out was it possible to speak the real message of the hour, for humility was a term not to be understood by that man who had bartered his Master for silver. That humility which Jesus taught his disciples by his significant action that night was to be their truest characteristic; no professional virtue, but a vital and essential feature in the lives of all who would be his followers.

Then came that series of teachings which are the most cherished portion of the gospel. It was a delightful and confidential talk which Jesus had with his friends. He had no longer any reservation save those imposed by the limits of their minds. He taught them that the way to God was no longer obscure, as always hitherto. Judaism had beset it with numberless forms which only served to deepen the impression that it was difficult to reach the presence of God. With Jesus this condition passed away. He was himself the way to God. To be near him was to be in the circle of divine life. He told them that he was the truth and that by the truth they were to be made free. He did not mean that he was a body of doctrine, or that he wished for them the mere possession of a creed. But he would have them see things in their right proportions and thus be freed from that slavery which is the result of wrong perspective. When men put important things second, life can never be free. He told them, moreover, that he was life—eternal life. He meant that to possess him, to have his mind, to see things as he saw them, to be saturated with his Spirit, was to live already a life whose quality was eternal. On such a life the smell of death could never come. He came to bring such life to the world. It was his deepest joy to have men receive it. Again, he told them, in the fifth lesson, that he was going away, by which he meant that it was necessary that he should disappear from them in bodily form. While he stayed, they watched him and followed only when he led in the narrow circle of his earthly ministry. When he was no longer visible, but was present in his spirit, they became filled with enthusiasm for his work, which took them to the ends of the earth. He told themin the parable of the vine and branches that the secret of life is contact with him. It is also the secret of power. Some speak of "the enduement of power," the "baptism of power" and similar things, as though it came down upon a man and sent him forth with a tireless energy for the accomplishment of the divine will. Power does not come in this way. It is the result of keeping the channel open to the reservoir; of keeping the branch in vital union with the vine. Power comes naturally when sought in the proper way. It is not to be found in spiritual emotion, nor in spasmodic enthusiasm, but in continuous union with Christ which sends men forth full of divine enthusiasm to do his will.

Having finished his instructions to his friends, Jesus felt that the time had come for his final manifestation to the world in an experience which seemed to be the overthrow of every hope, but was in reality the open door to triumph. In the seventh lesson Judas accomplished his purpose of handing Jesus over to the Jewish court. It is hardly possible that Judas hated Jesus or sought his overthrow. Men do not hate Jesus, but they sell him. In the next lesson the story of the Jewish trial is told. Jesus came unto his own and they received him not. That people which should have been a wall of fire to protect their Messiah from harm, complacently turned their back upon him. Before the governor, Jesus stood as judge, the real master of the situation, while the Roman, between fear and duty, washed his hands and went his way in silence, and all the years point at him with accusing finger. In the supreme moments of his suffering on the cross, in the consummation of that ministry of sacrifice which wrought the world's redemption, Jesus remembered the tender ministries of his own home, and appointed to his best loved disciple the duty of a son to that mother whom he had ever loved. And then came the victory of the first day of the week. Mary, whose whole soul was one emotion of love, came upon the Master, and knowing him at last sped away to tell the others of his rising. To them he came to assure them that he was theirs as never before; that although he went from their side, he remained as their abiding Master to the end. Thus, as one discovers in the last lesson of the quarter, the triumph of Christ was completed, not alone in his resurrection conquest of death, but in his victory over the powers of sin which had held the world in bondage. The triumph of Christ is repeated in every life when in it the Master rises again from the dead and the manifestation of his nature in the soul appears.

Thus again we finish the great theme of the life of Christ—ever fresh, ever new, ever the same, yet ever changing. We finish it that we may again begin. It is with satisfaction as we close these studies of our Savior's life set forth in the Gospel of John, that we look forward to the renewal of this theme in the International Lessons of next year, which are devoted through the whole twelve months to this great subject as presented by all the Gospels. Meantime, shall not the Christ be with us, in even truer presence than that seen by his disciples on the shores of Galilee twenty centuries ago?

TOPIC FOR JULY 2.

OUR COUNTRY FOR CHRIST.

(Ps. 33:10-22.)

When Paul passed through Athens with all its idolatry and all its philosophy, with all its getting and all its spending, with all its questioning and all its sinning, he nevertheless said: "I perceive that in all things ye are a very religious people." He could say the same thing of America. Some one said recently of Kentuckians, "They are very fast and religious." He could have said it of all our nation, in some respects. With all our rapidity, all our sordidness, all our lust of wealth and power—with all our faults we are a very religious people.

When our war with Spain broke out, we went into it religiously. We were like our fathers of the Revolutionary War—we prayed before we went to battle.

"The earth is full of anger,
The seas are dark with wrath,
The nations in their harness
Go up against our path.
Ere yet we lose the legions,
Ere yet we draw the blade,
Jehovah of the thunders,
Lord God of battles aid!"

Such was the spirit before Bunker Hill and Manila. Whether we erred in either case is not the point. We most of us believe we were right. But right or wrong, we were and are religious. The "In God we trust," which encircles our coins is not a blasphemy. "God reigns and the Government at Washington still lives" is not an empty bit of rhetoric, but is the American spirit speaking through our beloved Garfield.

But further than this, our nation is also a moral people. It would ill become us to talk so of ourselves, but it is the verdict of other nations that America is the most moral nation on earth. We are a temperate nation, so temperate as to be wondered and even laughed at abroad. Long live the cause of such laughter! We are a truthful nation. Witness the shirt-sleeved diplomacy. We are a nation of sacred home-life. It is the family which is the unit of democracy, the safeguard of civilization. And so our virtues are enumerated, not by ourselves, but first of all by foreigners.

Let us only see to it that we are worthy of our traditions, worthy of our ancestors, worthy of ourselves. If we are moral, remember that so were the Romans in their better days. If we are religious, remember that so were the Greeks before they lost all religion and then all place in the world. Forbid that we forget God or trust in the strength of our own arm!

"For heathen heart that puts its trust
In reeking tube and iron shard,
All valiant dust that builds on dust,
And guarding calls not thee to guard,
For frantic boast and foolish word,
Thy mercy on thy people Lord!"

It is the part of Endeavorers to keep the scutcheon clean, to live such lives, to vote such votes, to work in such politics and business as will not merely preserve, but elevate the standards of our national life. "Clear the land of evil; make ye sure to each his own, that he reaps what he hath sown." Enter heartily into the municipal, county, state and national life. Read the Bible, but read the newspapers, too. Be familiar with the life of Israel, but be familiar with the life of America to-day as well. Glory in the past, but live in the present, and "whatsoever ye do, work heartily as unto the Lord, and not as unto men."

ORGANIC EVOLUTION CONSIDERED

By ALFRED FAIRHURST,
Professor of Natural Science in Kentucky University.

21 Chapters, 386 Pages, $1.50

This work is a very thorough and scholarly discussion of evolution by one who has had many years' experience as a teacher of science in Kentucky University at Lexington, Ky.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Introduction, Matter, Force, Method of Creation, Spontaneous Generation, Natural Selection, Paleontology, Embryology, Special Objections to the Theory of Evolution, Rudimentary Organs, Secondary Sexual Differences, Instinct, The Origin of Man, A Future Life, Design in Nature, Evil and Altruism in Nature, Agnosticism, Recapitulation, Genesis and Geology, Appendix.

Having been for many years a teacher of various branches of natural science, it has been my duty to discuss the subject of organic evolution. This volume contains some of the objections which I have from time to time presented againt the acceptance of that theory, together with several chapters on other subjects.—Author's Preface.

It seems to me that any candid person who reads the book must close it with the conviction that the hypothesis of the origin of organic species by the process of evolution is not only an unproved hypothesis, as its ablest advocates admit, but one that is essentially false. In addition to what the author says on the subject of evolution, he furnishes the unscientific reader with a large amount of information about matter in its various forms and about organized beings that is both interesting and valuable.—J. W. McGarvey, Lexington, Ky.

NEW JUVENILES

Saturday Talk Series of Biographical Sketches
And Short Stories for Children

BY MRS. LAURA GEROULD CRAIG.

PUBLISHED IN SIX VOLUMES. PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

Vol. I. Little Presidents.
Vol. II. Little Kings.
Vol. III. Little Queens.
Vol. IV. Little Orators.
Vol. V. Little Generals.
Vol. VI. Little Statesmen.

"Fritz and his Cadets."—Illustration from Little Kings.

The author thoroughly understands the mental wants of the child, and in these volumes these wants are happily met. The biographical sketches of the great men of the world, while they were growing into greatness, are always fascinating to the children.

These stories are presented in such an attractive manner that the mind of the child will retain them all through life. The little folks that will carefully read these stories will be in possession of many of the little incidents in the lives of a large number of the great men and women who have blessed the world with their lives. These little volumes should be placed in the homes of this country to bless children. The little ones of the family should know the facts given in this series of biographical stories, and thus early in life they can be taught that the "Lives of great men all remind us we can make our lives sublime."

CORTER.

Hattie E. Corter, wife of Eld. W. R. Corter, was born in Rush County, Ind., May 5, 1871, died in Lawrenceville, Ill., June 12, 1899. She was an exemplary member of the Christian Church from the age of 13 until her death. Bro. and Sister Corter were married April 4, 1889. Our dear pastor has the sympathy of the entire community in this dark hour of his bereavement. J. W. McCLEURE.

Lawrenceville, Ill., June 14, 1899.

PETERSON.

Iona Belle, oldest daughter of Eld. J. E. Harris, of Talmage, Neb., was born at Williams Center, Ohio, May 8, 1867. She obeyed the gospel when 12 years old, and was married to George Peterson, Feb. 3, 1889. For the last few years she had been a great sufferer, from heart trouble and although everything was done for her that loving hearts could devise, or money procure, she grew worse until the morning of May 29, she closed her eyes to things of earth. By her special request the funeral services were conducted by the writer, after which the body was laid to rest in Grant Cemetery, near what had been her beautiful home near Talmage. To her loved ones this would be, indeed, a crushing blow, were it not for the hope of the gospel which enables them ts say; "Thanks be to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has begotten us to a lively hope hy the resurrection of his Son, Jesus Christ, from the dead."

CYRUS ALTON.

Elmwood, Neb., June 3, 1899.

ROUTH.

Daniel B. Routh was born in Clinton county, Ohio, May 6, 1819, and died June 3, 1899, at his home near Herman, Ill., where he nas lived for the last 48 years, aged 80 years and 28 days. In February, 1842, he was married to Jane A. Smith, who passed over several years ago. Two sons were given them, one of whom survives. He became a Christian in 1840 He has since been a consistent member of the body of Christ and an earnest worker.

C. B. DABNEY.

SWEENEY.

Mary S. Bailey was born in Casey county, Ky., May 8, 1832. She came to Augusta, Kan., in June, 1892, where she died May 26, 1899, aged 67 years and 18 days. She was married to Maj. G. W. Sweeney, Aug. 26, 1849. To them 10 children were born, six of whom, with her husband, survive her. She was a mother to stepchildren, adopted children and grand children. A member of the Christian Church for 58 years. Her stepson said, "She was a mother to me." Surely, she will receive her reward. R. W. WOODSIDE.

Christian S. S. Literature

WHY USE IT?

For the same reason that Christian Churches employ Christian preachers. Preachers are instructors, but not more so than the literature placed in the hands of the children. If first impressions are most lasting, would it not be safer to put sectarian preachers in our pulpits than sectarian literature in our Sunday-schools?

Sunday-school instruction should be in harmony with the teaching of the Bible. The literature published by the Christian Publishing Company is sound to the core, and proclaims the Old Jerusalem Gospel in all its simplicity and purity.

Commencement at Eureka College.

The 45th annual commencement of Eureka College is now of the past. The exercises in connection with the event were held in the Mission Tabernacle, beginning Sunday morning, June 11. This was baccalaureate day, and nature furnished one rarely propitious. The sermon was by Pastor J. E. Lynn, of Springfield, and was full of the inspiration of faith. His theme was "The Immanence of God: Its Realization as an Influence on Human Character." Pastor Lynn will find a welcome when he comes again.

On Monday evening was held the annual contest and exhibition of the three literary societies. A splendid program was given, consisting of music, instrumental and vocal, orations, declamations and debate. When the markings of the judges were summed up the honors proved to be evenly divided. Though emulation had been keen, envy had no footing. But not so the next day.

Tuesday was Annual Field Day, and the contest for the silver cup was a sharp one between the Freshmen and the Juniors, the latter winning by seventy points to sixty-four. This being the third winning in succession for the Junior class, the cup remains the permanent property of that class in college. The day was closed by a play, the "Rivals," rendered by the Senior class in lieu of the regulation class-day exercises.

Wednesday afternoon and evening were given over to Alumni reunion. A banquet at Lida's Wood was spread for about sixty of Eureka's sons and daughters, young and old, and at 8 P. M. Geo. A. Miller, of Covington, Ky., of the class of '90, delivered the annual Alumni address. His theme was "Our Great Inheritance." The man was worthy of the occasion, and the address was worthy of the man. Prof. H. N. Herrick, of Chicago, was recommended by the Alumni Association for trustee, vice W. H. Cannon, whose time had expired.

Thursday morning, Commencement Day. The day was fresh and bright—a perfect day. A splendid audience greeted the occasion. A great variety of sweet music was furnished by the Plowe Quartette, of Peoria. But there was one discord among all the harmonies—the non-arrival of Dr. Tyrrell, the speaker of the day. However, at the last moment, Dr. Hardin and the Senior class called out Prof. B. J. Radford to meet the emergency. He responded heartily in one of his characteristic educational addresses, and the emergency was met; or, rather, the emergency seemed to have disappeared. After the address, which was very highly appreciated, the degree of Bachelor of Arts was conferred upon eight young men by Pres. Hardin, also a number of certificates of proficiency were bestowed in various subordinate departments. Another pleasant feature of the hour was the unveiling of a splendid picture of T. E. Bondurant, Eureka College's most liberal patron, which was presented to the college by Pres. Hardin in the name of Miss Mary Bondurant, of Deland, Ill. Tender mention was made also of the late Miss Marcia Waughop, who for more than a year and a half occupied the chair of English. As her dying blessing she sends two hundred dollars to the library fund. The purchased books will be "for a memorial of her."

The day and the week were closed by the rendering of an Oratorio, "The Nazarene," by the School of Music under the direction of Prof. Thomas. It was a fitting close to a splendid commencement week, and helps us all to turn our faces to the future with hopes and prayers for better things to come.

To Teachers and College Professors.

In 1896 members of the Church of Christ and others in Alma, Marion county, Ill., erected a substantial college building with six recitation rooms and a chapel. School has been maintained in the building three years.

Clark Braden closed a spring term June 16. The trustees, the people of Alma and vicinity and the brotherhood of Southern Illinois desire to have a school under the control of the Church of Christ built up and maintained in Southern Illinois.

There is no such school within 150 miles of Alma. In the southern half of the state there are more than 300 congregations with a membership of moro than 20,000. These have many pupils in schools that are not under the control of the Church of Christ.

These and other pupils that could be secured would insure good patronage for the school. The trustees of the college property in Alma offer the use of the building and grounds free of charge to competent teachers.

Clark Braden will continue as president of the college and will co-operate with such teachers who will unite with him in canvassing and working for the school and in building up and maintaining a first-class institution on the basis of a pro rata sharing of the net proceeds of the tuition. We feel confident that the right persons can build a strong school and secure useful and honorable positions and remunerative work. Address all correspondence to Clark Braden, Alma, Ill.

What We Plead For

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition,
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

MEN OF YESTERDAY

A Series of Character Sketches of Prominent Men Among the Disciples of Christ.

BY THOMAS W. GRAFTON.

Author of "Life of Alexander Campbell."

This volume contains biographical sketches of Walter Scott, Barton W. Stone, John Smith, Isaac Errett, B. W. Johnson and Otis A. Burgess.

The essential facts in the lives of these men are told in an attractive style. This volume meets the demand for information concerning these worthy men, presented brief enough to be read and appreciated by readers of to-day.

TESTIMONIALS.

"Men of Yesterday" is written in that pleasing style that made the "Life of Alexander Campbell," by the same author, so greatly admired. It would be an especially good book to put into the hands of young people. The narratives are full of interest, and these are men with whom the generation now growing up should have some acquaintance."—Peter Ainslie, Editor Christian Tribune, Baltimore, Md.

"The men mentioned in 'Men of Yesterday' are worthy of these sketches and the sketches are worthy of the men. Their histories will inspire noble lives in o hers. These sketches are not long enough to be wearisome, and not so brief as to be unsatisfactory. The author is happy in his chosen field, happy in the title of the book and happy in the treatment of his subject."—M. M. Davis, Dallas, Tex.

Christian S. S. Literature

WHY USE IT?

For the same reason that Christian Churches employ Christian preachers. Preachers are instructors, but not more so than the literature placed in the hands of the children. If first impressions are most lasting, would it not be safer to put sectarian preachers in our pulpits than sectarian literature in our Sunday-schools?

Sunday-school instruction should be in harmony with the teaching of the Bible. The literature published by the Christian Publishing Company is sound to the core, and proclaims the Old Jerusalem Gospel in all its simplicity and purity.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Mayor Jones, of Toledo, takes an optimistic view of trusts. In a communication to the Chicago Record he says: "I believe in a large program for society. I believe it to be our duty and privilege in this republic to find a plan big enough to provide for all of the people, and I see in the growth of the trust an indication of the growing social movement toward collectivism. I believe in brotherhood; so do the makers of the trust. They believe in brotherhood for the fellows that are in the trusts; I believe in the brotherhood of all men. The trust is the great American Brotherhood (Limited). We will yet learn to utilize the trust by amending the title, leaving off the last word." In other words, Mayor Jones, with many other believers in social reform, regards the trust as a preliminary step in the direction of Christian socialism. He looks upon the trust as in the nature of a labor-saving institution, and believes it, like all other labor-saving devices, should be used for the public good instead of for the enrichment of a few. The trust, he says, is to be operated for the benefit of the people "as we now own and operate the post office trust." He can see "neither sense nor reason in the attempts to destroy the labor-saving machines by legislation," but he sees both reason and hope for the American people in the movement that will utilize all kinds of labor-saving machines, including the trusts, for the benefit of the whole people." "The movement toward municipal ownership, toward public ownership, toward co-operation of every sort, indicates the channel through which the people are to come into possession of their own." This is far from the motive that is actuating those who are actively engaged in forming trusts, but who knows but that the tendency toward trust-formation is a necessary step in the establishment of a more equitable and satisfactory industrial system?

The American people are not more unanimous in anything, perhaps, than in ascribing great honor to Admiral Dewey for his decisive victory over the Spanish fleet at Manila. Not many, however, could tell the precise points where the Admiral displayed his ability. We are helped in our understanding of this matter by Lord Brassey's "Navy Annual," an authoritative work, which enters into an analysis of the battle of Manila Bay. The Annual says:

"While the action in Manila Bay was thus a foregone conclusion, conveying only lessons of an obvious character, Commodore Dewey's proceedings on May 1 merit the highest commendation. The entrance channel leading into Manila Bay, south of Caballo Island, is 8,000 yards wide and the navigation is easy. Such a channel could not be effectively defended at night by artillery fire; but there were mines which are popularly credited with great moral effect. In ignoring all risks and making straight for his objective—the enemy's squadron—Commodore Dewey followed the best naval traditions and fully deserved his success. . . . The naval weapon of the United States in the Far East, ready for war as that weapon can and should always be, was able to strike hard within a week of the receipt of orders, although the nearest national port lay 7,000 miles away."

In other words Admiral, then Commodore Dewey, was ready to act instantaneously when the crisis arose, knew exactly what to do and how to do it, and went at it without any hesitation or delay, assuming all the risks involved, and accomplishing the purpose he had in view. These are qualities that enter into every great commander.

Our readers who keep posted as to the movements of our troops in the Philippines, while admiring the pluck and dauntless heroism of our troops, cannot fail to be impressed with the perseverance and recuperative energy of the Filipinos. Several times have they been reported in our press dispatches as completely scattered and demoralized, and as often has it happened they have rallied their forces and been able to give battle to our troops at another point. During the past week Gen. Wheaton has continued his advance into the territory south of Manila, capturing the new Filipino headquarters, Perez das Marinas. At this writing he is pressing on toward Buena Vista, which he will, no doubt, occupy before this appears in print. The treachery of the Fillpino character is brought out in the fact that the people who received our troops in the Cavite Province with demonstrations of joy, subsequently made an attack upon them, inflicting considerable loss. It is reported that steps will be taken at once to strengthen the army in the Philippines so as to enable them to occupy the places captured, and to more speedily end the insurrection. Most of the American people will certainly agree that if the United States must subdue the insurgents in the Island of Luzon, the sooner and the more effectually it is done the better it will be, both for this country and for the Philippines.

After a period of chaos in French politics, which endured about as long as the safety of the republic would permit, Senator Waldeck-Rousseau has accepted the premiership, and has succeeded at last in forming a Cabinet. The announcement as to who the Cabinet ministers are has caused a good deal of surprise in Paris, as it represents a combination of different shades of political beliefs not hitherto attempted in a French Cabinet. The new Cabinet announced is as follows: Senator Waldeck-Rousseau, president of the council of ministers and minister of the interior; M. Delcasse, minister of foreign affairs; Gen. Marquis de Gallifet, minister of war; M. De Lanessan, minister of marine; M. Monis, minister of justice; M. Pierre Daudin, minister of public works; M. Caillaux, minister of finance; M. Millerand, minister of commerce; M. Leygues, minister of public instruction; M. Decrais, minister of the colonies; M. Jean Dupuy, minister of agriculture. It is said that the new ministry will be marked by two characteristics—the defense of the republic and justice to Dreyfus. These we take it are very essential features for a French Cabinet at the present time. It remains to be seen, of course, how long this combination of different political parties will stand. Its early fall is predicted by some, but it is probable that under the pressure of the present political situation in France, the coalition will stand until at least the present political situation in France, the coalition will stand until at least the present crisis is past.

The situation in South Africa has not materially changed within the last week, although there is more hope expressed that diplomacy will solve the problem without war. Some of the leading statesmen and members of the Cabinet of Great Britain have recently given forth pacific statements which are having a quieting effect upon the British public. While the British Government is reinforcing its troops at Cape Town and is putting itself in a condition of readiness for war, if war comes, there is a disposition at the same time to exhaust all the resources of diplomacy before an appeal to arms is made. The Rt. Hon. Chas. T. Richie, president of the Board of Trade, and a member of the British Cabinet, has expressed the sentiment that "two virtues only are necessary for the pacific solution of the crisis—patience and firmness." By firmness is meant, no doubt, that Great Britain is to insist on the rights of her subjects in South Africa and eventually it is believed the necessary concessions will be granted and a conflict avoided.

Admiral Dewey, on his homeward journey, has reached Colombo, Ceylon, and has had a foretaste there of what he will receive in increasing proportion as he nears his native land. The Admiral was received at the jetty by a guard of honor, and was driven in the governor's carriage, amid cheers, to breakfast with Col. Savage. After his return to the Olympia he received a deputation representing the Planters' Association and the Chamber of Commerce, who presented him with a silver casket and an address as a memento of his visit. The delegation also presented a thousand pounds of tea to the crew of the Olympia. In replying to the address of welcome, Admiral Dewey said he wished he could reply in adequate terms, reciprocating the sentiments expressed in the address, but that he spoke from his heart when he said he deeply appreciated the welcome. Referring to the guard that met him at the jetty, he said: "That cheer raised on the jetty, when I landed, which went to the hearts of all of us. We are 14,000 miles from home, but that cheer will be heard in America, although the way in which it has touched me I shall never be able to fully express. The two nations were never so closely allied by mutual sympathy and appreciation as now. The American people realized this during the late war, and you can imagine how all those who were at Manila and met Sir Edward Chichester (commander of the British first-class cruiser, Immortalite) and his gallant comrades, hold that feeling very deeply." Admiral Dewey will remain at Colombo about a week before continuing his journey.

The hearty reception which Duc d'Arcos, Spain's new minister to the United States, has received in Washington illustrates how soon the feelings engendered by war are dissipated by the return of peace. Special efforts were made to convince the Spanish minister that the people of this country entertain no resentment to Spain, or to any Spaniard in this country. The Duke appreciated highly the spirit in which he has been received, and had communicated the same to his government at Madrid, and to his personal friends in Spain. The incident will have a good effect in healing the wounds of the late war, and in convincing Spain of the good will of this country. Our war with Spain was the result of conflicting policies growing out of fundamental difference in ideas of government, and now that the cause of conflict has been removed, there is no reason why the two nations should not get on amicably together, as indeed there is every prospect that they will.

It is remarkable how the country has settled down on the idea that General Henderson, of Iowa, is to be the next speaker of the House to succeed Mr. Reed. The matter seems to be about as securely settled as if Congress had convened and an election had been held. The newspapers have been the medium through which public opinion has voiced itself, and especially the opinion of the people's representatives in Congress. They have decided that Mr. Henderson is to be the speaker, and this ends the matter. There is a good deal of speculation already as to the committee appointments which the new speaker will make. It is not likely, however, that he will make any very radical changes in the committees. It has been suggested that a new committee will be needed on insular affairs, to which is to be referred all matters pertaining to Porto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines. It has been given out, not by Mr. Henderson himself, but by those who are close to him, that he will not follow the example of Mr. Reed in reference to the government of the House, but that he will entrust to the committee on rules the power of regulating the business of the House. Mr. Reed had the reputation of being autocratic, recognizing whom he chose, and forwarding such measures as he pleased. The new speaker will hardly assume so much responsibility, but will rely more upon the action of the committee on rules, of which he may not himself be a member.

THE TWO EXTREMES AND THE REMEDY.

Every intelligent student and observer of our history knows that from the beginning there have been two extreme tendencies among us. The same, however, is true, probably, of all religious bodies. We have had an extreme conservatism on the one hand, and an extreme liberalism on the other. Douglas Jerrold once wittily described an extreme conservative as "one who had such respect for the old moon that he would not look at the new." We have never been without this class of men, certainly not within the last half century of our movement. They have been opposed to every enlargement of the work, or to every new agent for its enlargement, on the ground that it was breaking with the past and was without scriptural warrant. They have seemed, to many of us at least, to be in bondage to the letter of the law and the gospel, and often to neglect its spirit. They have caused no little friction in our local church organization and management, and kept us discussing plans of mission work for a quarter of a century or more. They have been alarmed at every new idea that has been advanced, lest it should exert a revolutionary influence. They have steadily refused to go forward, although in spite of themselves they have gone forward, walking backward, however, with their faces turned longingly to the past. We would not say that this class of persons have served no good purpose among us. They have, at least, taught us patience, and have emphasized the necessity of caution.

On the other hand, there has always been another class, not so numerous as the first, who have been impatient with what they regarded as our slow progress, and who have wished to advance at a gait altogether too rapid for the main body. As relates to matters of faith and doctrine, they have manifested a more or less rationalistic tendency. They represent a type of mind that sees truth, not in its relations, but in its disconnected parts, and who are given to indiscreet and unsafe utterances. They are frequently led astray by an overdose of reading of a certain class of books, without any sufficient antidote from another class, and especially from the Scriptures. Their impulse toward progress is right enough, but their progress is not always in the right direction, and their method is frequently ill-advised. They are too ready to accept any new theory, simply because it is new. They lay too great emphasis upon what is new, and too little upon what is old and fundamental.

Neither one of these classes, happily, has exerted a controlling influence upon our movement. The great body of those who have been associated with this religious reformation has never belonged to either of these classes. This third class, which represents the main body, may be said to be conservatively progressive. They believe in progress, both in religious thought and in the methods and measure of religious activity. They believe in advancing, but by following faithfully in the footsteps of Christ. They believe that any diminution of emphasis upon His divine character and supreme authority is not progress, but retrogression. They are not opposed to biblical criticism. They believe that a thorough investigation of all the historical questions connected with the Bible is not only inevitable, but is quite important to a full understanding of that inspired literature, which has changed the course of human history and is revolutionizing the world. They discriminate between theories of inspiration and revelation, and the great facts themselves. They believe that many of our theories concerning the Bible must undergo change and modification, but that the Old Book itself will come out of the ordeal of criticism, not only unharmed, but occupying a higher place in the thought and life of intelligent men than ever before, because it will be better understood. They discountenance all rash criticisms or utterances that would undermine the faith of the people in the essential truth and authority of the Bible. Of course, there are gradations in each of the three classes which we have mentioned, but we believe we have faithfully characterized them in their distinguishing features.

It will be readily conceded, by the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST at least, that the two extremes of ultra-conservatism and ultra-liberalism are to be avoided. But what is the remedy for these two opposite evils? We believe it is to be found in a good, old-fashioned revival of religion. When a boy we used to hear a song with the refrain, "Lord, I want more religion." This, it seems to us, might well be the cry of the whole church of God to-day. The deepening of the spiritual life is the only adequate remedy for the perils which threaten the church from without and from within. Throwing stones at conservatives and liberals will accomplish but little. Let the tide of spiritual life flow deeply and steadily within the church, filling all the channels of its activities to the brim, and little harm will come from either of these extremes. The man who rejoices daily in the knowledge of sins forgiven, and who is experiencing the sweetness of personal fellowship with Jesus Christ, is not going to be found opposing all the methods devised for giving expression to this life in the larger activities of the church. Nor will he be continually alarmed at the presentation of new thoughts and new interpretations, seeing that his own growth in the divine life is continually giving him new and enlarged views of divine things. Nor will he, on the other hand, be drawn away from the simplicity which is in Christ Jesus to a practical denial of his Lord, nor find a stumbling-block in the way of his faith in the interposition of the divine in human affairs, seeing that God is in his daily life, strengthening him, comforting him and guiding him on his way.

Here, then, is our remedy for the mechanical, legalistic conception of Christianity which refuses to grow, on the one hand, and for that erratic liberalism, on the other, which refuses to be subject to the law of Christ. The hope of our future success and triumph is in our growth in spiritual life and power. If only the roots of our faith shall reach down and take firmly hold of the eternal verities, if we shall seek close and vital fellowship with Jesus Christ, rejoicing in a present salvation while looking forward to a future one, we shall neither be seriously delayed by obstinate conservatism nor turned out of the true path of our progress by a false and misnamed liberalism. So shall we accomplish the great mission to which we have been called in the providence of God.

A BELATED COMMENT.

The Interior, of Chicago, indulges in the following comment upon the Congress held in St. Louis in April last. One would hardly expect so belated a notice, and one containing so much misinformation, from so wide-awake a religious journal as the Interior. It says:

Just why the denomination calling itself The Disciples of Christ should have chosen for the name of its first annual convention the designation "Congress" is past finding out, since a congress is a distinctively legislative body and this denomination repudiates both creeds and (ecclesiastical) laws. It is indeed significant of its strict independency, that while now ninety-five years old this is the first general meeting in which the interests of the denomination, as a whole, have been considered. Of course, no attempt was made to come to any consensus of doctrine or policy in this rally, held at St. Louis, but a good deal of denominational enthusiasm was aroused and questions of vital importance were discussed. The first paper presented was curiously upon "The History of Doctrine," the somewhat singular ground being taken that doctrine is essential to the life of the individual, but impossible in the corporate life of a church. As a matter of fact, the papers read all drifted toward the historic positions of the churches from which the founders seceded in the early part of the present century. Even upon the question of "Enrichment of Public Worship" the position taken was essentially that of the older denominations, that public worship should be free in spirit, but scriptural in form. Despite the disintegrating theory upon which this church is based, it is slowly crystallizing into a formal organization not unlike those bodies from which it originally withdrew. There is in Christian life itself an attraction toward unity which independency can not satisfy and even prelacy can not wholly destroy.

What sort of a Rip Vanwinkle nap has the Interior been taking, any way, that it should demur, at this late day, against such a use of the term "Congress," as if it were a recent innovation. Has it not heard of church congresses, without number, both in the Old World and in the New, which have no legislative functions? There is nothing in the meaning of the word "congress" to signify legislation.

The Interior thinks it "significant of our strict independency," that while we are "ninety-five years old, this is the first general meeting in which the interests of the denomination, as a whole, have been considered." Here is evidence of another long nap, for the Disciples of Christ have been holding general meetings to consider their general interests for fifty years. Has the Interior never heard of our great annual missionary gatherings, in which our missionary, educational and benevolent interests are considered? Did it never read of the communion service in Tomlinson's Hall, Indianapolis, at which five thousand Disciples sat down together to celebrate the Lord's death in one of their great national conventions? Governor Mount, who sat upon the platform at the side of the writer, said that while he had been a delegate to the General Assemblies of the Presbyterian Church, he had never witnessed a communion service of such magnitude and impressiveness as that.

Again, we are told that "the papers read all drifted toward the historic positions of the churches from which the founders seceded in the early part of the present century." This is good! If there was one truth that received emphasis above another in the Congress, it was the inutility and mischievous character of human creeds, against which our fathers made their protest "in the early part of the present century." Time and again it was stated and emphasized that the Deity and Lordship of Jesus Christ was the alone and sufficient creed of the church which Christ built. Our fathers never "seceded" from the churches to which they had severally belonged, because of any fundamental doctrine of Christian faith and practice which received emphasis at this Congress, but because of what they believed to be divisive and unscriptural practices.

Once more: The Interior refers to "the disintegrating theory upon which this church is based." Well, the "theory," or faith as we call it, upon which the reilgious movement of the Disciples is based, is the Divinity and Lordship of Jesus Christ, as the central truth of the Christian system; that faith in Him is the evangelical, saving faith of the gospel; that obedience to Him is the sole test of fellowship. If this is a "disintegrating theory" will the Interior have the kindness to point out a unifying theory, in order that we may accept it? for we are seeking to promote the unity of the followers of Christ according to his prayer. The "attraction toward unity" which neither independency, nor prelacy, nor presbyterianism can wholly destroy, is found in Jesus Christ, the divine Magnet, who said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."

"ECCLESIASTICAL LIBELERS."

At a recent meeting of the Chicago Presbytery the Rev. Dr. John H. Boyd, moderator, according to the press dispatches, strongly condemed ecclesiastical libelers and demanded, so it is said, their punishment according to the laws governing the Presbyterian denomination. The hearty applause which greeted the utterances of Dr. Boyd indicated that he had touched a sympathetic chord.

Among other things reported as coming from the lips of Dr. Boyd is the following:

"In civil life, if one man libels or slanders another the injured citizen has recourse to the courts. The church law provides a penalty for this character of offence, and it should be applied. I do not care to mention any names in this connection. I refer particularly to the class of ministers who libel their brothers, either in letters or by word of mouth."

The following pertinent words are found on the editorial page of the Christian Oracle:

"Just now there is need for forbearance and exemplification of the true Christian spirit of toleration, and a firm endeavor to seek to understand before condemnation is pronounced.

"Logic is sometimes a tyrant. To conclude because a person takes one position he must necessarily take another, has always been ruinous to the spirit of love, and will be now if insisted upon. What may appear to one as a logical conclusion may not so appear to another. Honesty demands that we show the spirit of toleration to those who differ from us, not only to those who agree with us.

"Let us hold every brother innocent till he is proved guilty. And by all means refuse to condemn him before the brotherhood, till he has had an opportunity to explain his position."

In discussion the cause of truth is not advanced by an indulgence in personalities, but rather suffers injury. Truth is not elicited by slanderous misrepresentations. To call a man a heretic now does not necessarily doom him in the estimation of intelligent persons. To hurl this erstwhile ugly epithet is often helpful to a man. Injury is sustained usually by the man or the paper indulging in the exercise.

Differences of oppinion have always existed, and it is safe to say will continue as long as men think. They existed in the apostolic age as in our time. The Spirit of the Christ was and is tolerant. "Forbear one another in love" is a maxim of the New Testament.

The Disciples of Christ are the last people on earth to permit a difference of understanding, a difference of interpretation, difference of opini on, to disturb Christian fellowship. Faith in Christ and obedience to him is the true bond of fellowship, and not oneness of understanding nor a hundred things that could easily be mentioned. This is fundamental to "our plea" as presented by "the fathers."

Let discussion continue, but let personalities be omitted. Let there be the purest thought and the fullest and frankest expression of the same. Let us in the midst of this ferment "hold every brother innocent till he is proved guilty." Let there be such an atmosphere of mutual trust and affection among the Disciples of Christ that the "ecclesiastic libeler" cannot live in it.

Hour of Prayer.

AS LIGHTS IN THE WORLD.

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, July 5th.)

(Phil. 8:12-16; Eph. 5:8-14.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: It is God's plan to enlighten the world by shining upon it through the medium of believers who have themselves been enlightened by Him.

This is again the monthly concert of prayer for missions. The object of all true missionary work is to disseminate the light and drive away the darkness of the world. This was God's purpose in sending Jesus Christ into the world. He was the "true light" because in him dwelt "the fullness of the Godhead bodily." He was "the effulgence of his glory, and the very image of his his substance" (Hebrews 1:3). God is shining upon the world through his Son Jesus Christ, "who shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. 4-6).

Those in whose hearts God has shined through the face of Jesus Christ become light-bearers to the world. In the passage cited from the Philippian letter Paul is exhorting the brethren at Philippi to so live as becometh those who are set "as lights in the world, holding forth the Word of life." In order to this they are to be obedient unto God, who is working in them "both to will and to work, for his good pleasure;" to "do all things without murmurings and questionings;" to be "both blameless and harmeless, children of God without blemish, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation." The contrast between such lives and those of the world round about them would be such as to commend the religion which had worked this transformation in them. In this way they would be "holding forth the Word of life." By living more than by preaching are we "holding forth the Word of life" to others. The steady outraying light of a pure Christian life is more potent in commending Christ to others than all the sermons in the world would be without such a life to back them up.

The missionaries in foreign lands exert as much influence, perhaps, by their blameless lives and by the influence of their Christian homes, as by their preaching. The heathen sees in them and in their home life something higher and purer than they have ever known, and they are led to inquire into the secret of it. How important it is, therefore, that we send as missionaries to the heathen world those only whose lives will be a suitable commentary on the religion which they are to teach. The same principle, however, applies in our own country.

In the second passage, cited above, the Ephesians are reminded that they were "once darkness, but are now light in the Lord;" they are exhorted, therefore, to "walk as children of light, proving what is well-pleasing unto the Lord." Not only are they to personally abstain from evil works, but they are exhorted to "have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather even reprove them." Christians must make their influence felt against every form of wickedness. Light is itself a protest against darkness, but we too often fail to let our light shine by way of reproof. There should be about the life of every Christian such a positive influence in favor of righteousness and against wickedness, as to make it a constant rebuke to every form of iniquity. A man who can live in a community any length of time without the people learning that he is a follower of Christ is not the type of a Christian that is to convert the world. He is not shining as a light in the world.

Let us, at this meeting, and continually, think of our obligations as children of light to those who sit in the regions of darkness. Let us understand that God has laid upon us the duty of sending the light to those who have it not. Let us remember the faithful missionaries who, in far-away fields of labor, are seeking to give the light of life to those who are perishing in darkness. Let us resolve that we, individually, will so live henceforth that our lives may reflect the light of the life of Christ to those with whom we come in contact.

PRAYER.

O Thou who art the source of light and life, we thank Thee that Thou hast shined upon this dark world in the face of Jesus Christ, Thy Son. We thank Thee that that light has shined into our hearts until we know something of Thy glory, of Thy character and of Thy will. Help us, we beseech Thee, to recognize our obligations to send the light to others who are yet in the midst of moral darkness. Bless our missionaries, we pray Thee, who, at the sacrifice of home and kindred and native-land, are "holding forth the Word of life" in distant lands to those who know Thee not nor Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent. Do Thou richly endow them with Thy grace and wisdom and crown their labors with success. And bless those, too, who, in the dark places of our own country, are seeking to scatter the light. And we pray Thee, our Father, that each of us may be so endowed with Thy Spirit that our daily lives may reflect the light of life upon the paths of men. We ask it in Christ's name. Amen!

MACATAWA MUSINGS.

The difference between life here on the lakeside and that in the city is not chiefly a difference in temperature, though that is by no means inconsiderable. A serious problem in the city life, with one who feels the necessity of a little rest and recreation each day from the labors and cares which weigh upon him, is what to do with a leisure hour or two. He wants air, outdoor exercise and something to amuse or interest him, and that will be a change from his daily toil. Few men can sit down and play with their fingers and do nothing and be content. We have found it, therefore, exceedingly difficult to rest in the city. Here on the lakeside, it is very different. The hours of the day not employed in study or writing can be interestingly employed in any one of a dozen modes of recreation. If one is in a mood for solitude and meditation, he can, in a five minutes' walk, be in the midst of primeval woods, where the only noise that reaches him is the gentle sighing of the wind through the trees, the notes of birds and those other gentle sounds which make the very stillness audible. If he is prompted, either by his appetite or love of the sport to angle for the finny tribe, here is every facility and opportunity for that sort of sport. If he prefers to play the mariner and ride the waves, here is Lake Michigan with its wide stretch of blue waters, or landlocked Black Lake, quiet, placid; and here are steam launches, sailboats and rowboats, and he can take his choice according to his fancy. In these and other ways, every hour not needed for actual work can be utilized for actual rest and recreation.

Take a single day as an illustration of the variety of occupations which the place offers. An hour's reading in the cool and quiet of the morning, with the gentle ripple of the lake, and the twittering of birds in the trees. Then a crowd on the pier indicates that the perch are in. Our good, faithful rowboat, "Judith," is soon carrying us through the channel out into Lake Michigan, where we have a lively time for an hour or two with the perch, securing all we need for domestic use. Then we row down the lake opposite Edgewood-on-the-Lake, land and pull our boat ashore. We are now in good trim for editorial work, and a few hours of dictation supplies the necessary "copy" for the day, and attends to the necessary correspondence. Dinner and the noon rest. Then we organize a family expedition down the lake-shore for wood. We noticed on a recent walk that the storms during the past winter had brought in a large amount of fragments of broken timber, which had dried on the beach. The boat was filled with the family and we rowed down to where the wood was plenty, landed and soon had the boat ladened with choice fuel. One of the number then rowed the boat back opposite the cottage, favored by a friendly south breeze, the rest walking on the beach. This might have been work, but we made it fun. How different it was from the hauling of wood, which we knew in our boyhood days! It was an economic measure, too, because wood comes high here when bought of the Park Association. After supper we took the boat around through the channel to the boathouse on Black Lake, enjoying a quiet evening hour on the water, secured the evening mail, made inquiries for some cottages for friends, and closed a day scarcely less monotonous than the average day at the Park.

Macatawa Park presents a scene of considerable activity at present. The government dredgeboat is at work deepening the channel, and as we write, we see in the distance the long sandbarge being towed out into the lake to empty its contents in the deep. This must be done each year, as the sand drifts in during the storms of the winter season. In addition to that, new walks are being laid in many places, a large number of cottages are in process of erection and repair, so that a large corps of men is employed about the Park each day. All the indications point to a season of unusual activity and prosperity. There is great demand for cottages, and desirable locations are becoming scarcer each day. Additional facilities, however, are being continually provided, so that a larger number can be accommodated. The leading hotels, the one at Macatawa Park, and the other across the channel at Ottawa Beach, will open on Saturday of this week, and the season is expected to be opened fully by the first of July. A restaurant and lunch counter is being built in connection with Macatawa Hotel at which cheap meals can be secured by those who may wish to take rooms elsewhere and secure their meals there.

We had a very delightful day with the Dutch brethren in Holland on last Lord's day, on the occasion of the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class of the High School. It was our first opportunity to address an audience in Holland. The audience in Hope Church was very large, and seemed to be composed of an intelligent and appreciative class of people. There were fourteen graduates of the High School who, together with the teachers and the Board of Education of the city, occupied pews in front. The music for the occasion was special and very good. We have previously, in this column, related how the city of Holland was founded by refugees from the ecclesiastical oppression of the Old World, who sought religious liberty in the wilds of Michigan, and located this town here at the head of Black Lake, which they called Holland, after their native country. They represent the Dutch Reformed Church, and are thoroughly evengelical in their faith, and seem to be a devoted and united people. They extended us, on this occasion, a very cordial welcome, and gave many hearty expressions of appreciation of the discourse. The annual banquet of the Holland High School Alumni Association was held at Macatawa Park Hotel, on Friday evening of this week, at which the editor and his wife were invited guests.

It was a very enjoyable occasion, and manifested a great deal of interest in education and in their High School in particular.

The weather has been almost ideal during the past week. The mornings have been beautiful in their quietude and coolness,and the evenings have been glorious with radiant sunsets and moonlit lakes and woods. The cottagers are coming in now and cottages that are for rent are being rapidly taken. Brother Tyrrell came over with his family this week and locating them in a cottage near us, returned to his work in Chicago. He will spend a few weeks here later in the season. The families of J. J. Haley and J. Z. Tyler are expected next week. St. Louis, as usual, is having a liberal representation here. The families of Thomson, Young and Everet are already on the ground, and others from there will be here before this is printed. We have to-day secured a cottage for Brother A. M. Atkinson and family, who will be here about the first of July. The Holland and Chicago Line of steamers are now running regularly between these two places, leaving Chicago (No. 1, State Street) at 7 o'clock each evening except Friday and Saturday. On Friday the boat leaves at 4 P. M., and Saturday at 9 A. M. This is the cheaper and pleasanter route if one has no dread of the water. The boats leaving Chicago at 7 reach here at 3 or 4 in the morning, and passengers for this place generally go on to Holland and return from there by electric car. The boat leaving Chicago at 4 P. M. reaches here at 11 P. M. This information is given to answer a number of inquiries concerning how to reach here.

We have been pondering much of late over the future of our educational institutions. Few of us seem to realize how dependent we are upon them to supply the educated men and women upon whom the future of our cause depends. "Educational Day" ought to mean more to our churches this year than ever before. Let the preachers see to it that their congregations are made acquainted, next Lord's day, with our educational needs, and especially with the needs of the particular school in the state where the churches to which they preach are located. If Educational Day does not result in preparing the minds of the people to help our colleges financially, and in increasing their patronage, in vain will the day have been set apart to this high purpose. We have been thwarted in doing all that we had hoped to do in this our educational number, but we hope that enough will be found herein to at least remind preachers and brethren of the day and its significance. It will be discharging tardily a duty we owe our colleges if every pulpit, on next Lord's day, rings with a message to the brethren as to their obligations to these institutions, and if, as the result of such message, there shall be a revival of interest in them, resulting in a large increase to their endowment.

Questions and Answers.

A person believes in Christ with all his heart, repents of his sins and, fully desiring to obey Christ in baptism at once, accompanied by an administrator he starts for the water. Now, since God must see the overt act of obedience, and since he knows that the man's heart is all right, is it not just, as well as in harmony with God's revealed will in the Bible, to conclude that the moment God knows these things he absolves the man from all sin without waiting for the literal act of immersion? J.

As for that matter it would, perhaps, not be necessary for God to wait until the person became a penitent believer in order for Him to know that he would become such. It is useless for us to speculate as to when the act of pardon takes place in the mind of God. Enough for us that through faith in Christ, and self-surrender to him, we have the promise of remission of sins, and that when we have complied with these conditions we have the assurance of remission. Should anything prevent a penitent believer from carrying out the purpose of his heart in obeying Christ in baptism, we are justified by the spirit and teaching of the New Testament in regarding such an one as accepted of God. It is the condition of the heart in relation to God that decides one's destiny.

In your answer to the first question of A. Anthony, Sr., in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of March 16, you concluded by saying: "The churches we have established are indeed churches of Christ, but they do not constitute, collectively, the Church of Christ, but only a part of it." Will you please tell us what you consider the Church of Christ in its entirety to be?

Horace Siberell.

Pickering, Mo.

The Church of Christ in its largest New Testament sense, and in the sense in which we used the term in the quotation above, is composed of all who have been brought into fellowship with God through Christ; all the saved; all who are truly followers of Christ. These belong to no one religious body, but are scattered through all of them.

1. Did nte events propnesied of, mentioned in the Bible, occur to fulfill the prophecy, or did the prophet foretell events because he foresaw them?

2. Did those who were instrumental in the fulfillment of the prophecy have any choice to do or not to do what they did?

J. P. Perkins.

1. Events transpire as the result of preceding causes. One of these causes may be the very prophecy which fortells the event, but we are not to conceive of an event as transpiring for the sole purpose of fulfilling a prophecy.

2. It is neither the design nor the effect of prophecy, even as conceived of in the question, as foretelling future events, to deprive any one of his free agency. The men who fulfilled the prophecy concerning the crucifixion of Christ, for instance, did it of their own free will and, therefore, with "wicked hands."

There are some who strongly deny that any prophecy relates to a future return of the Jews to Jerusalem, but claim that all prophecies refer to the return from Babylon during the Babylonian captivity. Will you please give as full and definite an answer on this subject as your space will allow? P. H. C.

Virden, Ill.

We have never made a special study of the prophecies relating to the Jews. We think the best opinion of Bible scholars, however, incline to the view that the prophecies which some interpret as referring to the return of the Jews to Jerusalem or Palestine, either refer to their return from Babylonish captivity or to their conversion to Christ at some future time. There is, however, difference of opinion among Bible scholars on this question.

1. What was the cup which Jesus besought the Father to remove? Was it the physical suffering on the cross? If so, would he have rebuked Peter for attempting to snatch it from him? See Matt. 16:21-26.

2. What death is referred to in Heb. 5:7, concerning which Jesus "in the [days of his flesh offered up strong crying and tears unto him who was able to deliver him?" If it refers to physical death, in what sense did Jesus "taste death for every man," since men have continued to suffer physical death since as well as before the death of Christ?

E. H. James.

Milo, Franklin County, Ohio.

1. The cup to which Jesus referred in the garden was the whole cup of suffering, including the physical agony, we should say, but having as its chief ingredient the mental anguish which he bore in suffering, the just for the unjust. Peter was rebuked because he did not understand that the fulfillment of Christ's mission involved his suffering and death.

2. The death which Jesus died is the one referred to, we suppose, in Heb. 5:7. He tasted death for every man in the sense that his death had for its object the salvation of all men, not from physical death, but from sin.

The Religious World.

The First Presbyterian Church at Yonkers, in answer to an appeal from its pastor, Dr. Pentecost, has raised and forwarded to the Presbyterian Board the second $1,000 for the support of Mr. Rodger, at Manila. The Presbyterian Board has raised $10,000 for missionary work in Manila.

In a missionary number of the Cleveland Union Gospel News, Dr. L. Leonard, one of the best known missionary statisticians in the country, shows the missionary work of all societies and denominations in each of the different lands. The article is entitled "Foreign Missions in a Nutshell." The following summary of the article shows that there is much to be done before the gospel is even preached in all the world:

The earth's population is 1,500,000,000, of which more than 1,000,000,000 are yet non-Christian, say 800,000,000 heathen and 200,000,000 Mohammedan; 200,000,000 are Roman Catholic and 150,000,000 are Protestant. For the world's redemption Protestants are giving annually about $15,000,000; sustain a missionary force of 14,200, of whom 4,300 are ordained and 3,380 are unmarried woman; associated with them are 4,200 ordained natives; about 80,000 toilers in all. The stations and outstations occupied exceed 25,000; the communicants are upwards of 1,300,000 and increase at the rate of 75,000 annually; the adherents are estimated at 3,500,000, while almost 1,000,000 children and youth are being educated in the more than 20,000 schools.

Reformation of the Nineteenth Century

NINE DECADES OF HISTORY

THE TURBULENT PERIOD—VII.

W. T. MOORE.

The Dawn of Literature Among the Disciples.

THE OLD AND THE NEW.

Before the close of the war the Disciples made little or no progress in producing a literature commensurate with the needs of a great and growing religious body. The prolific pen of Mr. Campbell had been busy all the while, but most of his writings were controversial, and, therefore, not suitable to meet the wants of the period of development, wherein spiritual growth was the great need. While the Disciples were conducting their work objectively, so to speak, the polemics of Mr. Campbell and others were incomparably valuable; but when the work which had to be done was largely subjective, as was the case at the close of the war, then there was at once a felt demand for a different class of books and periodicals from those which had characterized the movement in its earlier days.

It is not here affirmed that the war produced the conditions which required this change. All that is claimed is that the war period saw the beginning of the end of the old state of things. Doubtless there had been a growing sentiment for sometime in favor of a forward movement in the character of the literature produced, and this feeling began to find expression during the war and immediately after its close. The Millennial Harbinger was still in the field, though Mr. Campbell had ceased to be its responsible editor. He still wrote for it occasionally, but during those days he contributed very little that may be regarded as of any very special value.

The size of the Harbinger was reduced in 1862, and Isaac Errett was added to its coeditors. He and those associated with him began to give the pages of the Harbinger a little different type. This type indicated the dawn of a somewhat new literature among the Disciples.

At this time the American Christian Review, edited by Benj. Franklin, was the only influential religious weekly published in the interest of the movement. This paper, like nearly all the periodicals of the Disciples, had been chiefly occupied with what were called "first principles;" that is, those primary matters which relate to the preaching of the gospel and the simplest conditions of organic life. The paper was ably conducted from the point of view indicated, and for the uneducated masses it became a powerful influence for good.

However, the conflict between the old and the new, to which attention has been called, made it impossible to perpetuate the type of advocacy to which the Review had committed itself, and from which it refused to depart in the slightest particular whatever. This stubbornness or steadfastness, whichever word may be used compelled a movement whose aim was the establishment of another weekly paper, which would more nearly meet the requirements, of life among the Disciples. This feeling took definite form toward the close of the year 1865, and consequently the prospectus of the Christian Standard was issued early in February of the following year, with Isaac Errett as its editor-in-chief. The first number of the paper did not appear until the following April, but all the arrangements were made for its publication before the death of Mr. Campbell, and consequently I am justified in reckoning it among the signs of the rise of a new literature following near upon the close of the war.

NEW BOOKS DEMANDED.

The books that had been published were practically of the same type as the periodicals. They were excellent in view of the purpose for which they were written, but they certainly had very little in them to meet the conditions of the progressive spirit which was rapidly taking possession of the brotherhood. Perhaps the only books that had been produced up to this time of any real value, as a special contribution to spiritual development, were "The Messiahship, or Great Demonstration," by Walter Scott, and "Communings in the Sanctuary," by Doctor R. Richardson. The former was a singularly strong argument in favor of the Messiahship of Jesus and was well calculated to address powerfully the spiritual nature of Christians as well as to produce conviction in the mind of sinners. With some revisions it could still be made one of the most useful books ever published by the Disciples for both evangelistic work and spiritual development.

From the beginning of our movement we had always taken a deep interest in translations of the New Testament. This feeling was strictly logical in view of our religious position. We magnified the Word of God as no other people did. It was, therefore, all-important that we should possess as far as possible the exact mind of the Holy Spirit in any translation that we might use. We felt that the authorized version, though incomparable in many respects, was nevertheless in some important particulars far from what it ought to be. Mr. Campbell had himself taught us to discredit King James' version, as he had published a version made by George Campbell, Philip Doddridge and others. Consequently, when it was proposed by the American Bible Union to publish a revised edition of the New Testament, the Disciples at once threw themselves into the proposal with a heartiness which did much to assure success, and as Mr. Campbell had been selected to translate the Acts of the Apostles, this fact gave additional interest to what the Disciples already felt in the forthcoming work.

The first edition of this translation was published in 1864. Upon the whole it was not very favorably received by scholars, and especially by those of the brotherhood. Its merits were many, and these were at once distinctly recognized. But it was a disappointment with respect to some important points where we had expected better things. However, the work was accepted as an important step in the right direction, and as such it was hailed with pleasure by the whole body of Disciples.

About the same time a new translation, by H. T. Anderson, appeared. This was a scholarly and valuable contribution to a faithful rendering of the Greek of the New Testament into modern English. It was at once compared by our critics with the work of the Bible Union, and the result reached was generally to the disadvantage of the latter. At the same it was almost universally conceded that even Anderson's translation did not meet the requirements of the whole case. While it claimed to be a new translation, it was after all little more than a revision, and even this revision was not always strictly in harmony with the original.

Nevertheless, both of these translations were very important, as they stimulated interest in the study of God's Word, while at the same time they emphasized the literary tendency already referred to as a characteristic of the period under consideration.

About this time there was a strongly expressed feeling that the hymn book which had been so long in use needed a thorough revision so that the hymnody of the churches could be brought up to the higher literary level which marked the period. The sentiment behind this expression had been growing for some years, but it did not take definite form until the annual meeting of the General Missionary Society in October, 1864. Prior to that time several brethren had been gathering material for a new hymn book. It was apparent that there was a chance for several rival hymn books to appear. This was thought by the wiser brethren very undesirable, and consequently an effort was made to induce Mr. Campbell, who owned the copyright of the old hymn book, to turn his book over to the General Missionary Society, so that this society could provide for a thorough revision, and thus secure what was needed, while at the same time the churches would be supplied with one hymn book instead of a number, that might be regarded as rivals.

This was believed to be an important step in order to preserve that harmony which had always characterized the brotherhood. The writer, perhaps, had as much to do with securing the transfer as any other man, though the task was not difficult for any one, as Mr. Campbell gave his consent readily, as soon as he was approached upon the subject with a clear statement of the whole case. However, it required some correspondence and personal conversation between parties mutually interested, and in all this I had the fullest participation, and consequently speak from personal experience as to the generous manner with which Mr. Campbell treated the request of his brethren.

THE TRUE HISTORY OF THE NEW HYMN BOOK.

The trust was accepted by the General Convention in 1864, and a committee accordingly appointed, consisting of Isaac

Erret, W. K. Pendleton, W. T. Moore, A. S. Hayden and T. M. Allen, to make the necessary revision of the old hymn book, as the changed condition of the churches seemed to demand; and, as there has been some misstatement of the facts as regards the compilation of the book afterward published, it may be well, for the sake of historical accuracy, that I should give a somewhat detailed account of the whole matter, as I certainly have had a perfect understanding of all that took place from the beginning.

At the commencement of the year 1865 I began my ministry with the Jefferson Avenue Church, Detroit, Mich., the church which had been so ably served by Isaac Errett prior to my accepting the pastorate. In my room during the early part of that year the new hymn book was practically made. William Baxter and myself had been for sometime gathering material for a new book, but when the committee was appointed by the General Convention to revise the old book Mr. Baxter generously allowed me the use of his contributions to the material which we had mutually brought together. My wife and myself took all this material, and after reading 20,000 hymns besides those already collected, arranged the principal matter of the new hymn book.

In this arrangement we intentionally put in about 300 hymns more than was thought necessary in order that there might be plenty of room for a wise selection among hymns that were almost equally good.

After this first selection had been made, Mr. Errett and Mr. Hayden came to Detroit and remained several days working with myself and wife in going over every thing we had done, reducing the hymns to about the right number after adding selections of their own. Our united work was then taken by Mr. Errett to Bethany, where he and Mr. Pendleton went over the whole, making such revisions and suggestions as were thought proper. This work was then brought back to Detroit and finally revised by Mr. Errett, Hayden and myself. Mr. Allen never had anything to do with making the book.

I have stated these particulars mainly for the purpose of doing justice to Mr. Hayden. In some of the accounts I have seen of the matter scarcely any of the facts are stated correctly, while practically no credit is given to Mr. Hayden at all in the compilation of the book; whereas, his musical and poetic feeling were of great value in producing what has been declared to be the best book of psalmody in the English language.

Several other books, papers and periodicals besides those already mentioned, might be referred to as the product of the period under review, but as my purpose is not to present an exhaustive treatment, but rather to notice tendencies, I do not deem it necessary to enumerate any further than I have already done.

NEED FOR SPIRITUAL LITERATURE.

Undoubtedly, a new literature had dawned, though the full development of it has not even yet been reached. The hymn book itself was no small contribution to devotional literature, and this was precisely one of the things that was needed among the Disciples of Christ. They had been engaged so much in polemics that there had been little time for the cultivation of the finer graces of the Christian life.

Nevertheless, there was a strong feeling already largely developed, and also a continual growth of this feeling, that something different from the old controversial books and papers was absolutely necessary in order to a higher spiritual development; and, as proof that I do not overstate the case, I may say that G. W. Rice, the publisher of the A. C. Review, told me during the days of which I am writing, that of all the books he sold to the readers of his paper (and he sent by post a great many every week) Hannah More's Prayers equaled perhaps all the other books put together. This certainly shows that our brethren were longing for real spiritual food, for when the readers of the Reveiw, which was intensely combative in its spirit, called for such a book as I have indicated, surely it cannot be doubted that the Disciples of Christ generally were in a mood for a little different kind of literature from what they had been accustomed to during their past history.

Let no one suppose from what has been stated that there is now no special need for the old literature which was the product of the earlier writers of this movement. This literature ought never to become obsolete. In some respects even the Christian Baptist is needed just as much to-day as it was in the days when it was first published. Its able discussions of fundamental principles have never been surpassed in anything that has been written since. Nor is it possible to supersede such works as the "Christian System," "Baptism: Its Antecedents and Consequents," by any modern books. These works have no equals in the matters they are intended to represent. They are simply without rivals.

Nor is it possible for young men who are preparing for the ministry to neglect these books without an irreparable loss in equipment for the great work which is yet to be accomplished. Indeed, it would add much to the strength of the present ministry of the Christian Churches if these great works of Mr. Campbell should be much more carefully and prayerfully studied than I fear is the case with many who imagine they have found all they need in some of the popular authors of the present day. I certainly do not mean that preachers should not have access to the best religious literature of the living age; but all the same, I would have them first become thoroughly grounded in the teachings of such men as Campbell, Scott, Richardson, Pendleton, Errett, etc., before drinking too profusely from the fountains of Dr. Fairburn, Ian MacLaren and Dr. G. A. Gordon. However, when the well-balanced preacher has made himself familiar with the pioneer writers of our movement, he can then afford to read such books as "The Christ in Modern Theology," "The Mind of the Master" and "The Christ of To-day." These last-mentioned are magnificent works, if we have once gained the proper critical point of view from which they may be considered; but whoever rushes into their pages without the necessary antecedent preparation may find out, when it is too late, that he has been building without a scriptural foundation and consequently has been building in vain.

While, therefore, the movement in favor of a new literature was in the right direction, it would have been fatal to the best interests of the churches if this new literature had practically set aside the old. But this was not the intention of those who plead for progress. The whole object was to make the new supplement the old and thus meet a rising need which the old could not supply. The goal has not yet been satisfactorily reached, but there is undoubtedly a rising tide, and the prospect is at least encouraging that a literature not altogether unworthy of the Disciples of Christ is actually in sight.

SOME PHASES OF THE CHRISTIAN UNION DISCUSSION.*

CHAS. M. SHARPE.

(Concluded.)

The more important thing, however, is to establish the second proposition, viz., that the continuance of denominationalism will tremendously hinder the realization of that personal union among all the individual followers of Christ for which he prayed and which he indicated as the supremely convincing argument to the world of his divine mission. This will abundantly appear from the following considerations.

First, the various religious bodies crystallized about principles peculiar to themselves. Their only excuse for existing was that they held something not represented or not sufficiently emphasized by others. It is evident, then, that the prosperity and perpetuity of any religious body will depend upon its loyalty to its peculiarity. Is it not equally evident that they who are laboring for the supremacy of different principles and doctrines must inevitably drift farther and farther asuder? If birds of a feather flock together, will not birds of a different feather flock apart? The interests of Presbyterianism and Episcopacy are not identical. True it is that in so far as they are Christian merely, their interests are identical, but that which makes them Christians is not identical with that which makes them Presbyterian and Episcopal respectively. Whenever their peculiar interests are in the ascendant the motive force is centrifugal—tending to division. When their common interest as Christians, merely, is in the ascendant the impulse is centripetal—tending toward union. But for the preservation of denominationalism peculiar interests must be kept to the front, and the effort necessary to keep them there must inevitably tend to the forcing apart of those for whom the Savior prayed that they might be one as he and his Father are one.

Second, we have all heard the familiar claim that denominationalism is a matter of temperament. It is natural that those of similar tastes and temperament should wish to be together and to exclude uncongenial elements. Since it is natural it is also best. The interests of the kingdom of God will be best subserved by such division. Here again we have the idea of conserving the peculiar. In this case it is peculiar tastes and temperament that are sought to be perpetuated. We would then have in the several great religious bodies peculiar peoples laboring for the supremacy of peculiar principles and sedulously avoiding all associations which might modify their peculiar temperament. If such conditions would not militate against unity of spirit in any practical sense, I beg to know what conditions would do so. What do our denominational advocates mean by unity of spirit among Christians? The union of Jesus with his Father was such that Jesus could say: "All things that the Father hath are mine" (Jno. 16:15). Upon the basis of the usual denominational pleas, that communal principle is set aside and this one substituted for it: "What I have is mine and I propose to keep it. What thou hast is thine and will thee please keep it to thyself. Lest thine and mine shall become mingled, we had better have as little to do with each other as possible. I will go my way. Go thou thy way and may the blessing of God attend thee." I submit to any fair-minded person that such a sentiment tends not toward unity of any kind, much less such a unity as that for which Christ prayed. There is much to indicate that the above expresses the real thought of those who talk most loudly of spiritual unity while at the same time advocating denominational divisions.

Am I, then, denying the possibility of a real spiritual unity between individuals belonging to different religious bodies? Not at all. I simply affirm that denominationalism seriously hinders such unity. It offers an occasion to the flesh and gives it an unfair advantage over the spirit. My brother in another communion, in so far as the regenerating power of the gospel has transformed him, will entertain for me a real and genuine spiritual affection, but in so far as any part of him has not been fully whelmed in the river of sanctification, he is exposed and vulnerable to the Satanic shafts of envy and malice. Denominationalism is an encouragement to Satan. He who does not see this to be true surely has read history to little purpose.

We turn now from this phase of the discussion and inquire what in fact are the tendencies in the denomidational world. Is the peculiar receiving greatest emphasis? Are certain tastes and temperaments tending to segregate and perpetuate themselves? Are centrifugal, or centripetal forces dominant?

Undoubtedly, peculiarities are not receiving the emphasis they once received. Resemblances are more sought after than contrasts. Polemics are not nearly so fierce. The oral debate has largely gone into disuse, while the discussions still carried on in our religious journals are for the most part so mild and gentle-spirited as scarcely to merit the title of controversy. Once in a great while some obstreperous Doctor or Professor breaks into the arena and rages against his opponents like a veritable "bull of Bashan." He effects nothing except the amusement of those he would destroy. They merely step aside while he in blind fury passes by, and "not a wave of trouble rolls across their peaceful breasts." This transformation in Christian controversy is not due to a loss of moral earnestness, but rather to the perception of two truths, not new, but so old as to be almost forgotten. The first of these, that human knowledge is relative, human thought fallible, is the revelation of our modern scholarship. The second, that "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God" and that gentleness is superior to violence, is merely the familiar teaching of Christianity. We are ready to exclaim with Cromwell: "I beseech you, brethren, in the bowels of the Lord, consider it possible that you may be mistaken;" and with the poet we have come to see that "power itself hath not one half the might of gentleness."

As for the conservation of certain tempermental types of character in the great religious bodies, modern social conditions are all against it. Secular education, which is almost universally homogeneous, is bound to influence successive generations toward resemblance rather than contrast. The Methodist type is not to-day what it was even twenty-five years ago. It tends to become less emotional and more intellectual. While Methodism does not propose to abandon the ground floor of its earthly tabernacle, it proposes to inhabit the upper story also. The new school of Presbyterianism very materially departs from the type of the old. Presbyterianism feels the need of some Armenian heart religion to relieve its Calvinistic congestion of the brain. There are even indications of restiveness in ritualistic churches. Great masses of the people are becoming sick of external form and crave a practical, spiritual content. This is the meaning of that much-mooted thing called "Americanism" in the Catholic Church. It is also the meaning of the sturdy opposition encountered by the Anglican High Churchmen in their attempted march to Rome. On the other hand non-ritualistic churches are coming to see that the value of a good thing is greatly enhanced by being put up in neat attractive packages.

Centripetal forces are dominant. Many voices are crying in the wilderness: "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight." High places are being leveled. Valleys are being exalted and a highway is being formed over which the chariots of the Lord may move to glorious conquest. Our Savior's prayer will be answered; nay, is being answered even now. Just what form the body of Christ will have in that "happy coming day" doth not yet fully appear, but we know it will be a "glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing." While I believe there are unmistakable tendencies toward a certain political form and doctrinal content, yet we must remember "how the course of time may swerve, crook and turn upon itself in many a backward streaming curve." W. Boyd Carpenter, the great Bishop of Ripon, expressed the ardent faith of a large portion of Christendom when at the late Church Congress he spoke of the "Religion of the Future" as follows: "The religion of the future will be neither Protestant nor Catholic, but simply Christian. The dogmas of the churches which have separated communion from communion will fall off as autumn leaves before the fresh winds of God. Many views which in the very providence of God have played their part in clearing the thoughts of men will pass into forgetfulness. Men will not grieve to see the old things go, for a larger faith will be theirs; they will not think God's world will fall apart because we tear up parchments more or less. The church of God will renew its youth. It will be content with a simpler symbol because it will have learned Christ. It will not need any longer Trent or Westminster or Lambeth or the Vatican to lead it. It will be satisfied with simpler thoughts and a purer faith. It will be satisfied to realize that 'there is one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all.' Meanwhile, above the uncertainty of the clouded future there ever hangs the authoritative ideal of the one family over which Christ is the head and which forever forbids hatred and strife among the people of God. 'One is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren.'"

SOME BERLIN PROFESSORS.

H. L. WILLETT.

ADOLPH HARNACK.—Perhaps the most interesting figure in the theological institutions of Germany is Professor Harnack, who occupies the chair of Church History in the University of Berlin. He is the leader of a large and influential school of thought which has, to a considerable extent, reached supremacy in the universities of Germany, although by no means without opposition. A man of such positive character and such qualities of leadership is sure to be both strongly loved and hated. He was born in 1851 at Dorpat, a university town on the Russian frontier, in the Baltic territory where the German speech prevails, his father being Professor of Theology in the institution of his native town. Harnack went early to the University of Leipsic, where he took the degrees of Licentiate in Theology and Doctor of Philosophy. He became assistant professor there in 1876, and in 1879 accepted the chair of Church History at Giessen. It was there that he began the great tasks which are chiefly associated with his name, the editions of the "Apostolic Fathers," and "The History of Doctrine." In 1886 he accepted a similar position in Marburg, and in 1889 went to Berlin, where he has gathered around him during the years of his work a body of men profoundly influenced by his spirit and characterized, like him, by enthusiasm in the work of scholarship.

The most notable portions of the immense mass of material which Harnack has produced, partly alone and partly with the help of his students, in recent years, are the later volumes of the "History ef Dogma" and his studies in New Testament literature and early Christiau writings. The number of books, pamphlets and articles that have come from this prolific worker is astonishing. One is amazed as he reads over the list of titles in the catalogue of the Royal Library of Berlin.

Harnack is a striking figure in the class room. He is somewhat above medium height, inclined to spareness in build, his forehead high, receding somewhat in front to the shock of standing hair, slightly sprinkled with gray, through which he frequently runs his fingers in a peculiarly nervous and eager gesture. A mustache hides only partially the firm lines of his mouth and chin. His eyes are particularly penetrating, and the effect of intensity is samewhat heightened by the glasses which he wears perpetually. His voice is clear and vibrant, and his manner in speaking is peculiarly magnetic. He usually comes sweeping into the class room, filled to its utmost capacity with students, and the slamming of the door as he shuts it behind him is the signal for instant attention throughout the room. He carries the air of one who has no time to lose, and not infrequently begins speaking before the desk is reached. Contrary to the usual custom of German professors, Dr. Harnack always stands as he reads. Indeed, "reads" is hardly the proper word, although it is usually applied to all university lectures. He speaks purely extempore, rarely referring to his notes, which he seems to brings with him purely as a matter of form. His manner throughout the lecture is that of one who is intensely interested in the theme, and this fact always brings the audience to a higher pitch of attention, which not infrequently reaches the point of vigorous applause as some striking or inspiring point is reached. Dr. Harnack is never quiet an instant; now leaning over the little stand in front of him, now half sitting on the arm or back of his chair, now throwing himself carelessly on the corner of the desk with his foot swinging in the air, and sometimes actually descending the steps of his platform in his earnest address, he may be said to assume every possible attitude and cover every available inch of space at his command. His method of work is a commentary upon his plan of getting things done. Every moment is utilized. His classes always meet early in the morning or late in the evening. A class at 8:30 A. M. on winter days in Germany seems hours before daylight. His great lecture courses generally occupy two hours, from 5 to 7 P. M., with a quarter hour intermission at 6. Thus he reserves practically the entire day for his studies. His seminar meets once a week, and in this some subject of church history, usually the careful reading of one of the Fathers,like Turtullian or Origen, is the work of the hour. This seminar is reserved for the men most experienced and trusted, is something of an honor to be admitted. In winter it is held in the Church History seminar room of the University. In summer at the Harnack home, where the wife and daughters add to the pleasure of the preliminary spread and social hour.

Prof. Harnack's type of mind is critical, scientific, and yet reverent. It is often said that one finds little religious feeling in German universities, and this inclines to be true; and yet the elements of moral and spiritual urgency enter into the work of few teachers, and perhaps even preachers, more than into that of the Professor of Church History in Berlin. The mind that is not aroused to a love of truth, a soul that is not quickened into a new spiritual activity, under the influence of this teacher is dull and phlegmatic to a degree. Men differ in the position they occupy theologically, but no one who knows Harnack can withhold from him recognition of his masterful influence over his students for good, an influence growing out of a profoundly religious life and a faith fixed on the great verities of the gospel.

Dr. Harnack is inclined to dissent from the ordinary view, that church history presents a great degeneration in the thought of the church, after the early fathers. He believes rather that there was constant progress in Christian thought. He inclines to give Augustine a larger place in a true system of theology than the Protestantism of the last century has assigned him. Between the Greek and the Latin Fathers, Harnack chooses the latter, and herein differs from the school which Professor Allen so earnestly represents in his "Continuity of Christian Thought." Harnack's view is that Augustine went back from speculation to faith, and that in this lay his most notable contribution to the thought of the church. Harnack's type of theology may in general be called Ritschlian, although it must be remembered that this term does not describe a homogeneous school, but rather certain qualities in common in men who differ widely in details.

He believes in absolute freedom in the application of all critical principles, both in biblical literature and in theology. He has a distrust of the speculative theology of either wing of the church in Germany. He believes that Christianity centers in a religious life and not in a system of knowledge. He places the strongest emphasis upon the divinity of Christ. No stronger assertions could be made on this point by the most enthusiastic Disciple. He believes in the revelation brought by Christ as the final message of God to the world. On the question of miracle he occupies what might be called a medium position; much more friendly to the emphasis upon the miracle than Hermann, of Marburg, but much less insistent upon it than Kaftan, his colleague in Berlin. He believes that the value of miracles lay in their evidencing power in the apostolic age; a power which they no longer possess, and which,as he believes,was always inferior to that of the teachings and character set forth by Christ. One may properly disagree with Harnack at this and many other points without underestimating the value of his positive convictions and teachings. Indeed, it is often true that he seems to discredit things which have been held as essential in the teaching of the church, not because he actually denies them, but because he is concerned to affirm that they ought not to be insisted upon as a test of Christian character. No man could more strongly proclaim salvation as possible only through Christ than he. The opening sentences of his recent lecture on Christianity and History, now widely scattered through this country, set forth this fact in striking terms. Many a student, doubting and troubled, has found heart to pray again after working for a time with this teacher. Such courses as that on the Lord's Prayer, which he gave not long ago as an open lectureship, have had notable results in the lives of the hearers. One always feels in listening to Harnack that he is most at home in the heart of things. While he is profoundly versed in matters of Christian biography and literature, he is at his best in discovering the merits or weakness of some type of thought which the centuries have produced. His constant watchword is the appeal to Christ. He is not content simpls to state a doctrine with absolute fairness to the authors, but he demands that it shall be compared with the standard of truth as disclosed in the life and ministry of the Master. In this he is one of the truest prophets of the time.

His studies in New Testament literature have been noteworthy, and his recent volume on the chronology of the New Testament writings has called forth vigorous discussion. The appearance of the volume and a hasty perusal of the preface led many to believe that it discounted entirely the critical results of recent years. Indeed, several conservatives who had read no further in the book than the preface rushed into print to announce the fact that the critical method had met its fate at last. The reading of the volume itself lends little comfort to such views. Harnack is broad enough to perceive that not a few theories of men who have used the critical method were rash and immature, and one of the most notable of his services is that of pointing out the inadequacy or the extravagant nature of some of these theories; but it must be affirmed, on the other hand, that every leading principle, and indeed every noteworthy result of modern biblical criticism is reaffirmed by him, and one is tempted to dissent from his conclusions at numerous points, such as his reference of the Johannean writings, including the Apocalypse, to the presbyter John rather than the apostles. It is not impossible that we shall discover later on that the presbyter John is a myth, the result of an interpolation in the famous passage in Eusebius.

Whatever may be one's views of Harnack's position, either in biblical criticism or in the study of theology, it is worth while to know something of the man who is so profoundly influencing German thought and the thought of the world in these days, and who exhibits in himself the happy combination of the most critical and scholarly methods of thought, of absolute fearlessness in the search for truth, of uncompromising hostility to all that is purely external and formal in religious life, of deep and abiding faith in the eternal verities of the gospel and of enthusiasm for righteousness which constantly manifests itself in ennobling and enriching Christian character among the men who sit at his feet.

More History, Less Fiction.

I plead for a larger place in college study and private reading for our standard histories. Fiction holds too prominent a place. It is no credit to have read all of Scott and Dickens and Thackeray and Lytton and MacDonald and Hawthorne and Howells. It must mean that they have read little of Hume and Gibbon and Macaulay and Froude and Bancroft and Parkman and Prescott and Fiske and McMaster. You can not nourish lumbermen and ship's pilots on pickles and ice cream, nor produce men and women of vigorous thought and firm purpose on works of fiction.

I note two important results which will follow the intelligent study of history.

1. It will broaden our horizon and enlarge our sympathies. We come to feel that on the march of life we touch elbows with people round the globe; that in a hundred ways we are "heirs of the ages." "I have a better opinion of England than I had," said one of my students after a term of English History. That was inevitable. America is possible because of England's thousand years of history, and the Current Reformation of the nineteenth century owes its being to that of the sixteenth century.

2. It will create a conviction that there is a plan of history. It sometimes seems as though there were no plan; no guiding hand; no "far-off event toward which all things move." Yet, even in such dark centuries as those that followed the break-up of the Roman Empire, deep down beneath the wild, tumultuous waves there was a current setting steadily toward a nobler political and religious life.

I may add that the more I study and the longer I teach the great world-movements, the more clearly I see that Christ is the key to history. The supreme lesson of history is this: that behind all laws of national life, above all the phenomena of human progress.

"Standeth God within the shadow,
Keeping watch above his own."

Hiram College.

Our Budget.

—July 2nd is Educational Day.

—Bring our educational interests to the front.

—Emphasize the importance of all our Bible colleges.

—Make known the urgent wants of all our educational institutions.

—Urge upon the churches the necessity of a deeper interest in the welfare of our educational institutions.

—Schools and colleges were made for man, and should be made to meet the demands of the highest type of civilization.

—In order to raise the $65,000 for the immediate needs of Drake University, F. M. Drake has added $7,500 to his former subscription of $25,000. It is hard to keep up with Governor Drake's donations to the cause of education and of missions in these latter days. Would that his spirit of liberality should become contageous with our men and women of wealth. We understand from the Christian Index that the entire amount called for, to wit, $65,000 for the immediate needs of Drake University, is now about all in hand. The University has just closed one of the best years in its history. The attendance in all departments was 891; including the summer school enrollment, 1,259. Drake University students and friends will observe educational day, July 2nd, with unusual interest and enthusiasm. The dissatisfaction over the teachings of Prof. Morgan has been removed by his withdrawal from the faculty of the University.

—Ashley S. Johnson, in the Southern Evangelist, says the last dollar of indebtedness on the school of evangelists, at Kimberlin Heights, Tenn., has been paid. This is good news, and to those who know the conditions upon which the work was undertaken it will be more than good news; it will be an evidence that God does hear and answer the sincere desire of the hearts of his earnest, consecrated servants. The school at Kimberlin Heights can now accommodate 150 preachers, and yet we predict that it will soon be as crowded as ever. An efficient school within the reach of all young men who want to preach the Gospel of Christ will never be other than crowded. We are glad of the success that has crowned the faithful labors of Brother and Sister Johnson at Kimberlin Heights, and wish them continued prosperity in their good work.

—In this paper we present an obituary notice of the recent death of "Father Sweeney," of Paris, Ky., from the Paris Reporter, and a brief of one of the many excellent tributes paid to his memory at his funeral, that of Prof. Graham. The life of "Father Sweeney," as he was called, is a remarkable one in many respects and a beautiful exemplification of the truth of many of the statements of the Holy Book on conditions vital to longevity, prosperity, holiness, and in the end a happy departure for the better world.

—The setting apart of a day for emphasizing the importance of educational interests and institutions, and its general observance on the part of Protestant religious bodies, is a complete refutation of the old criticism from infidels which says that Christianity is the enemy of education and churches the enemy of schools. The schools have no truer friends at heart than the Protestant churches and education no stronger supporters, morally and financially, than believers in the Christian religion. A popular education is not only consistent with the doctrines of the Christian religion, but greatly adorned and enhanced in value by it. Christianity, in fact, furnishes the only substantial basis for a practically operative and useful education—a good moral character, brotherly love and spiritual discernment.

—The likeness of Samuel K. Hoshour, one of the lamented pioneer preachers of Indiana, appears on our first page this week, and an interesting sketch of his life, by F. D. Power, of Washington, D. C., in another part of the paper. It was our pleasure to know this man of sainted memory, both as a preacher of the gospel and as a professor in the old Northwestern Christian University, and we are pleased to bear testimony to the excellency of the tribute to his memory by Bro. Power, to which we have the pleasure of referring our readers, in this paper.

—Any one who can give the address of A. J. Garnett, or that of his wife, Mrs. Hattie L. Garnett, will confer a great favor upon all concerned. Address W. A. Belding, 2141 Fifth Ave., Troy, N. Y.

—The announcement of Hazel Green Academy, Hazel Green, Ky., for 1899-1900 gives the record of a successful school year just closed and the prophecy of a better one for the year to come. This school is under the auspices of the national C. W. B. M.

A neatly printed booklet has been issued by the authorities of Butler College, of the University of Indianapolis, setting forth the basis of the affiliation of that institution of learning with the University of Chicago. Also something of its history, its relation to the University of Indianapolis, its faculty, its students, its libraries and laboratories, its courses of study, and of Butler Bible College.

—The United States Commission is preparing plans for an exhibition of Social Economy at the Paris Exposition of 1900. This exhibit will present a comprehensive picture of our national life, showing characteristic features of the country itself, the people and the typical, industrial and social institutions. A particularly noteworthy feature of this exhibit will be graphic presentations and movements for the betterment of industrial and social conditions and religious movements. To make this exhibit most effective the names and addresses of any clergy who are doing institutional church work, particularly in the country districts, are wanted. All such persons are requested to address W. H. Tolman, Dept. Social Economy, 105 East 22nd St., New York City, N. Y.

—The Disciples of Christ have made reasonable progress, along with other urgent duties, in educational interests and institutions. While we cannot yet boast of an ideal school, college or university, we have not a few whose efficiency has been proven by the men of whom they are the proud alma maters; men who have filled high stations in life; men who are active in the foremost duties of the day; men who have immortalized their names in the ministry of the gospel of Christ. The renewed interest in our schools, colleges and universities is, therefore, most timely and prophetic of their stability and enlarged usefulness. The great necessity which all our institutions of learning are under for larger endowments is not likely to go unheeded. Already are they feeling the impulse and reaping the fruits of this renewed interest, and the day will come when we can boast of self-sustaining institutions of learning, and in time of ideal ones.

—Now that the disposition of men of means to administer upon their own estates prior to their departure is increasing it is well to emphasize the importance of the educational institutions of our country, and especially of the church, as a suitable field for wise and liberal investments. A school well endowed will go on doing good in a way that is inestimable long after the departure of the donor. The world never witnessed more liberal endowments upon colleges and universities than during the last decade and the disposition is strengthening. But this field of usefulness should not be left to millionaires. There are men of smaller fortunes who would do well to imitate the example of their richer brethren, and we have many schools that need their liberality. A gift to educational uses does not have to go into the greatest universities to do the greatest good. There are institutions of learning more accessible to many who otherwise would never have the benefits of an education, and these need support. Let no one fear to leave their estate or gift to any well-located college or university that has proven its right to live.

—The receipts for Foreign Missions for the week ending June 21st amount to $8,689.02; gain, $1,407.25. The gain in the receipts for the first 21 days in June this year amounts to $5,189.80. The total receipts from Oct. 1, 1898, to June 21, 1899, amount to $105,067.60, or a gain over the corresponding time, 1898, of $14,750.13. Remember, we must reach $150,000 by Sept. 30th. This can be done. If we continue to gain during the next three months as we have during the past nine months, we will reach the amount. Let every school and church and friend respond at once. Send to F. M. Rains, Treas., Box 884, Cincinnati, O.

—The Texas Sunday closing law enacted by its last legislature has been declared constitutional and will be enforced. We have not seen a copy of the law, but the papers say that it closes everything on Sunday except drug-stores. We are glad to see Texas going to the front in moral laws and trust that she will set the example of enforcing the same. It is the boast of the saloon that it is law proof on the Sunday question, and we hope that some state will have the moral courage to demonstrate the fallacy of the assertion. That it is an outlaw on general principles cannot be denied, but the day is coming when saloons cannot be run on either general or special privileges as now. They have no right to exist upon any known moral principle.

—We print this week the first of a series of articles from Dr. H. L. Willett, describing some notable theological characters of Berlin, which we are sure will be found interesting and instructive to our readers. The men of whom he will treat in these articles have made a deep impression upon the religious thought of Germany, and are widely known throughout Christendom. The sketch of Professor Harnack, presented in this number of the paper, gives us a very vivid and life-like view of the man who is recognized as perhaps the highest human authority in the department of Church History.

—Detroit, Mich., is preparing for a great convention next month and will not be disappointed. Her lake breeze and other attractions are too inviting at this season of the year in addition to the inherent attractive and elevating powers of a national Christian Endeavor convention.

—While much is said in certain quarters about non-Christian schools, secular education, infidelity in our public schools, etc., it is well to remember that all schools in the United States are more or less under the influence of Christian teaching. While this may not yet be a real Christian nation, Christianity is so prominent everywhere in it that it is impossible to run a school wholly independent of Christian influence. The teachers and scholars of every school are in daily contact with Christianity in various channels and cannot wholly divest themselves of its influence. But this influence can be and is being greatly strengthened by the interest of the churches in the educational interests, institutions and standards of the country. The utterances of the pulpit and religious press generates and conserves the Christian sentiment even in our public schools, notwithstanding the exclusion therefrom of the Bible. But what we want to do is to increase this sentiment, that all educational institutions both of the church and of the state shall by absorbtion at least become more thoroughly Christian in spirit, purpose and common usefulness.

—From the Journal and Messenger, Toronto, we learn that the convention of the Disciples of Christ in Ontario, held in Toronto, June 1-5, was one of the most enthusiastic, helpful conventions in their history. The reports, sermons, addresses, music and all were inspiring. Our missionary secretaries of Cincinnati were there and made stirring missionary addresses. The reports, addresses, resolutions and actions of the conventions indicate that our brethren in Ontario are not only well organized for work and active, but that they are undertaking greater things for the Master in their country, just over the line, and in the cause of missions in general.

—In refusing to accept the gift of a mansion in Wasnington, D. C., which some of the admirers of Admiral Dewey had proposed to purchase for him with popular subscriptions, the Admiral has again displayed the gift of common sense which has so characterized his course since he became a man of fame. He prefers the care of a ship to that of a mansion and probably did not approve of the useless burden of its cost to his countrymen. All the indications are that he does not enjoy being idolized, and if he does not succumb to this tremendous power when he arrives at home he will have displayed greater resisting power than that by which he won his fame at Manila.

—We regret to learn that Dr. B. B. Tyler, of our editorial staff, has been unwell for a time and finds it necessary to take a trip to the Pacific Coast. He has been disabled from his work at Colorado Springs for a week. He expects to be absent on his trip for ten days, which trip, we hope, will restore him to his usual health. While absent he will attend the Washington Christian Endeavor Convention at Seattle. He expects to return to his work by July 2, and in his absence the pulpit will be supplied by J. S. Edwards.

—The type-man last week changed "bearing the heat and the burden of the day," in our budget items, to "having the heat and the burden of the day." We presume he thought to give the expression a more practical application.

—The wisdom of associating Bible schools with state universities, at first undertaken by the C. W. B. M. at Ann Arbor, Mich., is not becoming foolishness in the added light of a few years of experience. The conception is growing in the minds of the brotherhood and the experiment is being repeated in different states. In no place where the effort has been made has there been a failure, but rather an immediate and popular approval of the work. The economical argument in favor of such schools is of the most sensible character and will stand. The objection that such schools will be a detriment to our existing church institutions is more fanciful than real. The field of the annex schools is so nearly exclusive of that of our colleges that there is scarcely any visible friction or interference, and hence without them (the annex schools) these state university fields would go unreached, uncultivated and much-valued strength to the church would thereby be lost.

—The past year has been one of great prosperity with all our church schools. They have generally reported enlarged enrollments, larger faculties and more enthusiastic commencements than for years. While all of our colleges and universities are in great straits for need of larger endowments, a number of them, particularly Hiram, Eureka and Drake, have made large financial additions to their present endowments during the past year. Besides these, other of our schools have raised handsome amounts of money, or come into possessions that will greatly increase their efficiency for the future. But it is not only in these respects that our schools have been prospered within the past year; generally they are in a healthier condition. They have grown in the confidence of the brotherhood and have a stronger moral support probably than ever before. The state conventions held have generally passed resolutions of confidence in them and pledged the brotherhood of the state, in so far as they could do this, to their support. The future of our schools generally, therefore, is brighter and more hopeful than ever before. Even those for whom fears of dissolution were entertained for a season now have hope of meeting their financial obligations and renewing their hold upon life.

—The Interior sometime ago expressed the opinion that religious indifference, now widespread, is spreading wider. That indifference toward certain phases of religion, or rather to certain ecclesiastical doctrines and pulpits, is increasing cannot be doubted; neither should it be lamented; but this is not a full view of the subject. There is, on the other hand, an equally evident increase of interest in other phases of Christianity which are more generic and practical. This is manifest in Bible-school and Endeavor work, in education, in missionary work, in religious literature, in reform movements, in the increasing opposition to oppression, injustice and wrongs of every character. The essential elements of the Christian religion are increasing in their hold upon the people and the nations, rather than decreasing. The kingdom of heaven is now working as leaven in the meal as never before.

—The original poem in our Family Circle, by Grace Pearl Bronaugh, is of a high order and well worth a careful reading. The selected poems this week also have unusual merit.

—E. H. Kellar, in his excellent address on "City Evangelization," before the Texas state convention at Ft. Worth, printed in full in the last Courier, pertinently uses the Religious Telescope's striking distinction between elocution and "yellocution" in the pulpit. "Yelloquence" is not the instrument of a wise master builder.

—In opposing an enemy or a believed-to-be erroneous doctrine it is unwise, unnecessary and unjust to go beyond the facts. The enemy will be sure to seize upon the opportunity to neutralize thereby the force of any real argument put up against it. It seems that some papers, in their zeal in opposing Mormonism, have affirmed the existence of polygamy where it did not exist, and the Desert Evening News takes advantage of the error to weaken the argument against the present teaching and practice of Mormons and to make them appear to be a misrepresented, maligned, persecuted people, and to gain sympathy for them thereby. There are facts and fallacies enough in their system of religion and religious history to convict them without venturing on uncertain and uncertified reports; and the same rule holds good as to the treatment of any false system, religious error or demoralizing custom.

—Twenty thousand people in Russia are reported to be in a starving condition from famine, with seven hundred millions of dollars in gold piled up in the treasury for military purposes. Certainly these are the poles apart in the social conditions of that great empire. If the Peace Conference at the Hague could only find a way to put militarism in the background in Europe, that this pile of gold might go out into the industrial channels of Russia, the effects of a great famine in any part of that great empire would not be so disastrous. But as things now stand but little, comparatively, is being done for the famine-stricken districts of Russia, while every effort possible, we are told, is being made, by loans and otherwise, to increase Russia's stock of gold against the possibilities of war in the future.

—The Orphans' Home excursion had a fine day, a large attendance and a good time, but at the close of the day at the grounds the drowning of one of the number, a young man, threw a gloom over it all. The young man had gone into a creek near by for a swim, and being very warm, and the water very cold, it is supposed he was seized with cramps and sank. The name of the young man was Holmes A. Tilden, an employee at the new Y. M. C. A. building, Franklin and Grand Aves., this city. We are sorry that such a sad event should occur in connection with an excursion by our people, although no blame can be attached to any one, it seems, for the accident.

—At a meeting of the trustees of Drake University it was decided, by a vote of twelve to four to remove Prof. Morgan from the faculty of the University. The Times-Herald says that H. O. Breeden, pastor of the Central Church, opposed his removal on the ground that nothing had been proved sufficient to warrant such an action. The position of the majority of the trustees, expressed by General Drake, as reported in the Times-Herald, was, "No one will criticise us for defending the Bible." All regret with the trustees that the controversy over Prof. Morgan's views got into the papers, or that such an action as they have taken became necessary because of its adverse influence upon the University. But the brethren will generally feel that the trustees are best known to all the facts, and that they have acted in the best interest of the University and of the cause of primitive Christianity. If Prof. Morgan holds views on any fundamental element of the Christian religion not consonant with that held by the brotherhood, he cannot, of course, feel that he is being persecuted by the action of the trustees. At all events, we trust that the unpleasant controversy is now ended.

—Great preparations are being made by the brethren in Cincinnati for the Jubilee Convention. A. M. Harvuot, the chairman of the local central committee is giving the subject much time and careful thought, and he is being seconded heartily by all the churches in and about Cincinnati. The brethren of that city will be prepared for a great convention. All the signs, we learn, point to at least 10,000 delegates.

—The receipts for Foreign Missions for the week ending June 14th were $8,935.69; gain, $44.14.

—C. C. Rowlison, now pastor Third Christian Church, Indianapolis, Ind., successor to B. A. Jenkins, now president of the University of Indianapolis, delivered the annual address before Butler College. The address was so well appreciated that its publication in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST was requested and will appear in two numbers beginning in our next issue.

—One great problem before our brotherhood worthy of the most prayerful attention at this time is the need of larger endowments for our colleges. When we were a weak folk, religiously, in the world, large endowments for our schools could not be and was not expected. But it is different now. We have become a numerous, influential religious force in the land and as such we cannot shrink from the responsibility of our educational interests. We cannot go forward, we cannot even hold our present place as a religious factor in the world's history, without due attention to our educational interests and institutions. There is money enough in the brotherhood now to ably endow several of our well-located schools within a year, and this ought to be done. Not a year ought to pass now, in our history, without seeing one or more of our schools placed upon a financial footing that would guarantee its continuance and increased usefulness. In the very nature of things we will want greater institutions and the future will necessitate them, but before that we should see that those now doing efficient service for the church are put beyond the reach of the sheriff. The church is already under obligation to bestow greater liberality upon our colleges to say nothing of the increasing nature of this obligation as the years go by.

—We publish this week bulletin No. 1 on the Jubilee Convention to be held in Cincinnati in October. In it you will find the things you are wanting to know about that coming greatest convention of our history.

—Receipts to the American Christian Missionary Society for the week ending June 24th, were $2,840.11; gain, $1,723.06. Thirty-three of the 86 churches contributing are churches that did not send in an offering last year. The long looked-for gain has begun to come and churches that have held back their offerings are asked to make collections and send all or part of their offerings at once. The money is needed to meet maturing obligations. Send all remittances to Benj. L. Smith, Cor. Sec., Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, O.

—Gen. Miles, Rear-Admiral Sampson, Commodore Schley, Gen. Shafter, Capt. Coghlan, Lieut. Hodgson and other prominent officers of the army and navy have all brought trouble upon themselves by a too free use of the tongue when speaking of their experiences in the recent Spanish-American war. A better knowledge and use of the admonitions of the New Testament on the use of the tongue might have saved them many later regrets. Their experiences along this line ought to be a warning to Christians on the danger of inconsiderate, careless talking. Behold how great a fire a little matter kindleth!

—The great need of the Foreign Society at the present time is that of evangelists. It is not easy to get all the money needed, but it is easier to get money than to get workers who are thoroughly equipped. Recently appeals have been sent to nearly all our colleges, but among the graduates there are none ready for the field. It may be that more workers are not forthcoming because the church has not prayed for them as she should pray. We are told that if we agree as touching anything it shall be done of the Father.

A. McLean, Cor. Sec.

—The program of the 15th Annual Illinois Christian Encampment, Eureka, Ill., appears in this paper and merits the careful attention of all encampment and convention going Disciples of Christ. It is a strong program.

—Good laws can be enforced. Here is a word from a town that does it:

For several weeks now all the saloons here have been closed from midnight Saturday to midnight Sunday. All gambling houses have been closed and one slot machine banished. In all this we rejoice. W. F. Turner.
Joplin, Mo.

—The work which the Reform Bureau asks its members and friends to secure speedily is stated in the Twentieth Century Quarterly as follows:

1. Getting corrupt literature out of news room windows at least (p. 6). Let the watchword be, Street news rooms must be as clean as those of the railroads; 2. Cleaning the bill boards by appeal to the Mayor, who controls all shows; 3. Cancellation by him of the license of at least the worst theaters; 4. Confiscation of all gambling slot machines; 5. Suppression of at least the crying of Sunday papers, proved useless by silent sales in New York.

A little systematic work on the part of citizens interested in good government ought to readily secure these reforms in almost every city in the land.

—The Mt. Auburn Christian, edited by Jas. T. Nichols and published by the church, is an excellent local paper of eight pages.

—A writer in the Preacher's Helper on "What Kind of Preaching is Best Adapted to the Needs of Our Day?" says that it should be "positive," "unctious," "intelligent," "scriptural," "energetic," "commonsense," "personal," "joyful," "attractive." This is a very good summary of the elements of a good sermon for this or any other age. It will bear study, especially by preachers who are troubled over their ineffectiveness in the pulpit.

—Tolstoy is the greatest commoner of Russia, if not of the world, to-day. In an account of this wonderful man in the New Voice, June 17, by J. Montgomery M'Govern, is this quoted statement:

"Tolstoy has no theories that he does not carry into practice. He believes that every one should have an equal amount of work to perform, so he makes his own shoes and boots, and part of each day he devotes to working in a field near his house—not light gardening, but plowing, harrowing, digging—work that even a muzhik of his age would hesitate to attempt. He does not believe in rank or title, so he bids his peasants address him, not by his formal title of 'Illustrious Highnesf,' which his rank as a Russian count entitles him to, but as plain 'Lyoff Nicolaievitch.'

"His own room—the room where he does all his work, whether it be writing or shoemaking—is as plainly furnished and as bare of decoration as a muzhik's hut. It is in this room that he receives the peasants and talks to them, encouraging them and advising them, not as a lord to his servants, but as a father to his children.

"His religion? Ah, Tolstoy does not talk religion to us! He is good to all alike—Jew and Gentile—those that belong to the Russian Church [that is, of course, the Greek Church] and those that do not. 'Be peaceful,' he says, 'do not fight or get drunk, follow the example of the Christ-man, and the rest will take care of itself.'

"Ah," Brum Nelsonelka concluded, "if there were only more men to-day like Tolstoy this world would be a better world; and," she added with a shrug characteristically Russian, "there would be no Russia."

PERSONAL MENTION.

W. A. Foster has become the pastor of the Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati.

Sherman Hill and his wife are esteemed by the church at Hampton, Iowa, for their work's sake.

At the commencement of Bethany College the degree of M. A. was conferred upon A. O. Garrison.

O. D. Maple, now of Springfield, Ill., has a semi-comical lecture which he is ready to deliver wherever such a lecture is wanted.

J. P. Lichtenberger, pastor of the church in Canton, Ill., delivered the oration at the Odd Fellows' memorial day services, June 18th.

W. H. Hanna has returned from England, and is now at Carnegie, Pa., where he may be addressed by correspondents.

Bro. F. D. Srygley, editor of first page of Gospel Advocate, will begin a meeting at Alton, Oregon County, Mo., July 1st.

Henry F. Davis and his wife are absent on an excursion trip to Klondike. Whether he was attracted thither by golden prospects we know not.

Our very efficient Kansas City agent, Miss Mag. Wilson, leaves July 3rd for Shelbyville, Ky., to spend the summer in the blue grass region.

The sermon preached by J. S. Smith in Carrollton, Ill., June 11th, on "Our Policy in the Philippines" was published in the Patriot of that city.

Perry Thomas Martin, at the close of a pastorate of two and a half years in Brazil, Ind., June 25, will attend summer school at the University of Chicago during July and August.

D. H. Bays, author of a book exposing the fallacies of Mormonism, has now located at Englishville, Mich., and preaches for the church in that place.

B. W. R. Taylor is reported as having preached a forcible sermon in St. John's Episcopal Church, Los Angeles, Cal., recently on the true meaning of the term "Christian."

M. G. E. Bennett has taken work for the church at Clarion, Iowa. Children's Day offering exceeded any previous effort of the kind. His address is now Clarion, instead of DesMoines.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
IS THE BEST.
A pure, cream of tartar powder. Greatest in Leavening Strength. It makes lightest, sweetest, most wholesome food.
ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

H. A. Northcutt is holding a meeting in Deweese, Iowa.

E. W. Thornton, pastor of the South Prospect Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., recently delivered the memorial address at a union service of the nine lodges of Odd Fellows in that city.

A. M. Hootman, of North Tonawanda, N. Y., delivered the baccalaureate sermon for the Tonawanda High School graduates in the Christian Church at Broadway and Seymore Streets.

G. W. Hamilton, of Roby, Mo., will conclude his work for the church in that place August 1st and desires a field of labor in Southwest Missouri or Eastern Kansas. A country church preferred.

Eugene McFarland, of Stewart Iowa, who has accepted a call from the Fourth Christian Church, this city, and was to have begun his pastorate there on the first Sunday in July, will not arrive until the second Sunday in July.

J. P. Davis, now of Decatur, Ill., can be had by any church in need of a protracted meeting or wanting a pastor. He is an efficient man in either capacity. His address is 1259 West Main St., above city.

W. R. Seystone preached last Lord's day at the close of the Wellington-Dint meeting for the church at Marsville, Ontario, resulting in three confessions. He has been asked to begin a meeting with the Marsville church.

J. E. Lynn, of Springfield, Ill., delivered the baccalaurete sermon at Eureka College, June 11th. His theme was "The Conviction of the Immanence of God as it Affects Human Character."

Very high praise was expressed on the baccalaureate sermon delivered by F. W. Norton to the graduating class of the Niagra Falls High School. Bro. Norton is pastor of the Christian Church at Niagara Falls, N. Y.

H. Elliott Ward, of Pasadena, Cal., where he has labored for the past five years, expects to spend several months in the East this fall and winter, and can be had for evangelistic meetings or pulpit supply while in the East. Address him at Pasadena, Cal.

C. A. Young, our Chicago correspondent, being in this city last week with his wife and his sister, made this office a pleasant visit. He is full of hope concerning the outlook of the Bible Chair work in the hands of the C. W. B. M. and other interests. We are always glad to see Bro. Young and appreciate his pleasing, hopeful conversations.

Prof. C. E. Millard's use of the stereopticon illustrated solos and services as leader of song in his work in the Highlands Church, Denver, Col., is highly spoken of by the brethren of that church and commended to our city churches. Among those endorsing his work are G. K. Lewis, S. B. Moore, F. Payne and B. O. Aylesworth, all of Denver. Bro. Millard's address is Maysville, Mo.

T. Elmore Lucey, who enjoys the unsolicited endorsement of his popular poetical entertainments for Endeavor Societies, Bible-schools, lecture committees, colleges, etc., is a singer of ability and an enthusiastic worker in the church. Some of his poems have appeared in our columns, and have unusual merit. His address is Atlanta, Ga. His entertainments embody the higher and purer popular elements.

Luther Moore, the pastor of the Christian Church at Tuxedo, Mo., presented his resignation to his congregation yesterday, to take effect at once. He has had the matter under consideration for several weeks. The resignation was accepted, and resolutions expressive of the esteem in which Brother and Sister Moore were held by the congregation for their godly example and consecrated work were unanimously adopted. Bro. Moore has not accepted work elsewhere as yet, but for the present his address will be Hope, Ohio.

Walter S. Smith, Arlington, Ind., has composed a song entitled, "Your Mother is Praying for You," which has the promise of popularity. Both music and words are in a popular vein.

IOWA PERSONALS AND ITEMS.

Congressman John F. Lacy, of Oskaloosa, Iowa, delivered the address before the graduating classes of Drake University.

Pastor I. N. McCash, Acting Dean, A. M. Haggard and Pastor T. W. Grafton, of Rock Island, with their families, will spend a month in Cambridge and Boston. The Haggards and Graftons will take in the Detroit convention en route.

C. S. Early, of Drake University, class '99, has been called to Pueblo.

S. J. Carter, of same class, has a call from a good church in Northwest Iowa and another from a strong Nebraska church.

F. C. Aldinger, of Drake University, class '98, and A. M., of '99, has two invitations; one from Northern Iowa and one from the heart of Missouri.

J. B. Holmes, of class '99, so successful at Panora, Iowa, will locate in Kansas.

Lee Ferguson, of same class, will take a vacation in the West and return to his congregation in Northern Missouri, where he is greatly beloved.

L. C. Swan, another of the class of '99, will continue his work in the Iowa field, which he has occupied for a year or more.

Another, D. N. Gillette, wishes a field for all time. He will visit Indianola, Iowa, for part time till an opening occurs for whole time.

T. W. McDonald, of class of '99, has recently located in Jefferson, Iowa.

Edward Wright, of same class, continues his work in Central Iowa.

T. T. Thompson, also of class '99, is pastor of one of the East Des Moines churches.

The Iowa Interdenominational Sunday-school Convention met last week in Oskaloosa. Too few of our brethren were present. Many things invaluable to Sunday-shool workers were present.

I. N. McCash, of Des Moines, called for $550 to wipe out the remainder of a long-standing debt, and of course succeeded.

W. A. Moore, of Webster City, made a telling address on the work of "The Boys' Brigade."

A. M. Haggard conducted the closing consecration service.

Wm. Orr, of Clarinda, was active in counsel and was re-elected on the executive committee, as was also I. N. McCash.

M. Hedge, of Oskaloosa, was re-elected as one of the vice-presidents.

W. B. Clemmer, of Sloan, was helpful in many ways.

Geo. T. Smith, of Albia, Clayton Sanderson, of Eddyville, James Nichols, of Mt. Auburn, J. J. Nicholson, of Washington and Pastor Brown, of New Sharon, were all present.

W. B. Crewdson, of Corning, recently dedicated the new house at Brainard, raising nearly eleven hundred dollars.

B. S. Denny, the Iowa secretary, dedicated two churches in the last three weeks; one at Rockwell City and one at Bartlett.

E. L. Sampson, of Drake University, has taken the work at Volga City, Ia.

Allan B. Philputt, who delivered the excellent baccalaureate sermon at Drake University, on the commencement day following received the degree of Master of Divinity.

N. E. Cory, of Illinois, spent two weeks in Oskaloosa with his son, A. E. Cory.

David Kiser, of Mahaska County, Ia., an aged Disciple, passed to his reward a few days since. A. M. HAGGARD.

Samuel K. Hoshour.

One of the most interesting of the pioneers, of necessity only touched upon in our sketches, is S. K. Hoshour. He was born in Heidelburg township, York, Pa., Dec. 9, 1803, in a substantial "Pennsylvania Dutch" community, and was the son of a tanner. His father died when he was fourteen and his guardian allowed him to hire out to the neighbors. He received about three months schooling a year, under a Swiss teacher who spent his winters in "teaching and thumping the junior portion of the community," and his summers mending clocks and tin things. Young Hoshour confessed it was more pleasure to him to extract rabbits from their burrows and fishes from their watery deep than roots in the current arithmetics. In the summer of 1819, while in the service of a farmer who also ran a gristmill, his employer finding that his hireling was good at figures had him keep his books. His pay was four dollsrs a month and board. In the meantime, the Swiss teacher having left Heidelburg, and no one offering for the place, the miller suggested "Sammy Hoshour" as one who could read, write and cipher, and was, therefore, competent to teach the young idea how to shoot. He was invested with the ferule, quit hunting 'possums and chopping sausage meat, and gave himself to his new profession. In his new boarding house he found "Pilgrim's Progress" in German and read it—"the first book I ever read through!" "The spirit of the reading," he tells us, "and indeed of religion, became active in me." The following year he became a member of the Lutheran Church and at once aspired to the ministry. His guardian had no sympathy with his desire to improve himself, but through the aid of an uncle he entered "York Academy," where he remained several years.

In 1824 young Hoshour entered the Theological Institute, New Market, Va., and spent two years. He began preaching in both German and English. He taught for a time at New Market and was called to Smithsburg, Washington County, Maryland, in 1828. One of the marked features of his pastorate of three years at this place was the temperance agitation. Three of his principal members owned large distilleries. "Some of the saloonists of that day, members of the church, told me that my career and that of my coadjutors took the bread out of the mouths of their children."

Mr. Hoshour moved to Hagerstown in 1831, where he gave himself to teaching and soon became pastor of tne Luthern Church. He began a course of lectures upon the Bible which ultimately led to his change of views. The Bible in the Theological Seminary was "a book of reference, not properly a text-book." "We studied systematic theology with references to Bible passages which were deemed confirmatory of the dogmas inculcated in the text."

Six miles south of Hagerstown was the settlement of Beaver Creek, a rich and populous community without a church, but where different denominations occupied in turn the schoolhouse. In 1834 came "a proclaimer of the ancient gospel," who, calling attention to many neglected passages in "The Book" made "the Scriptures look almost new to reflecting minds." Soon forty persons were immersed. The "Campbellite proclaimer" made a stir. Rsports became current of his saying "there is no spiritual influence but that of the Word," and of his refusing to ask a blessing at the table, saying: "The blessing is already here, let us give thanks for it," and of his challenges to "sectarian preachers." A Methodist class leader encountered him, was defeated, and finally immersed by him. A leader in the community met Mr. Hoshour, told him of the havoc Webb was doing at Beaver Creek, and said: "You are the man to meet him, for I heard you once preach on baptism, and you made it very clear that sprinkling or pouring is valid."

Hoshour began to study up for the encounter. He had accepted these substitutes because less inconvenient than immersion. "This," he says, "was a theological theory without much biblical substratum." He read Luther's sermon, preached in 1518, where he declares: "Baptism, in the first place, in the Greek language is called baptismos and in the Latin tongue mersio, as when a person dips something into water until the water closes over it." He consulted Michaeles, who affirms: "The action which Christ commanded in his commission was immersion in water, for so signifies the Greek word baptizo, as every one versed in the Greek language must admit." He referred to Mosheim, also a Lutheran, who testifies: "The sacrament of baptism was administered by immersion of the whole body in the baptismal font." He saw that he could not meet the "troubles" of Israel, and he realized further that in sprinkling any one with water, and using the German "Ich taufe dich," he uttered a falsehood, seeing the expression means, "I dip you." Nor was it any better to say, "I baptize you," as the Greek has the same meaning. He was in great perplexity. "No one," he declares, "can understand the conflicts of mind I endured." He must either suppress his convictions or follow them; he chose the latter, and in April, 1835, was immersed near Hagerstown.

His wife wept all night when she learned this, thinking he had forever degraded himself. "Hoshour has been ducked!" ran rapidly through Hagerstown. People "looked askance at me as the foulest apostate. None of my old Lutheran friends deigned to recognize me." The Synod asked him to withdraw from it as he taught and practiced contrary to their doctrine and usages. This was done. He preached for a short time near New Market, Va., and in Washington County, Md., and in 1835 went West to Indiana, locating at Centerville, Wayne County, where he taught school, receiving twenty dollars a month for his services. He preached also as opportunity afforded.

Sept. 16, 1839, Mr. Hoshour moved ten miles west to Cambridge. Here he taught and preached and organized a church. "In the eleven years of my teaching, I lost but ten Lord's days that I did not preach, and for all this 'eleven years' preaching I did not get over $500—not $50 a year!" His salary as a Lutheran preacher in Hagerstown way $1,000 a year and a parsonage. Such was his sacrifice for the truth. He closed his work at Cambridge in 1846 and taught for a time at Asbury University, Greencastle, when Bishop Simpson was its president, and in the State University. In 1858 he was chosen president of Northwestern Christian University and served in that capacity and as a professor in the institution seventeen years. He was very inadequately paid as a teacher and tells us, "Seven thousand dollars' worth of my labors are in society in the heads of now available ladies and gentlemen in Indiana. Who will collect the amount? The most irritating phase to laborers of this type and predicament is that when they come into advanced life they are scorned as shiftless financiers." In 1876 Prof. and Mrs. Hoshour celebrated their golden wedding and friends presented them with $560 in gold coin. The fifth Lord's day in August, 1883, Prof. Hoshour preached his last sermon, from 2 Pet. 2 9. Ten days before his 80th anniversary he rested. Among his last words were, "O, the cross! the cross!" "They that be teachers shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever."

New York Letter.

At his request, Dr. James Butchart, our medical missionary to China, was solemnly ordained to the Christian ministry at the church on West 56th St., last Lord's day morning, June 18. Bro. F. H. Moore, who is supplying the pulpit there, conducted the opening services, and short addresses were made by Dr. Butchart and the writer, after which Elders James Carr and Robert Christie and F. H. Moore and S. T. Willis laid their hands on the candidate's head, the latter of the four offering the ordination prayer by which he was solemnly set apart to the work to which God has called him. Dr. Butchart has proven himself an efficient workman on the heathen field, and will return to his work in China in September. His ordination will give him recognition and prestige among many missionaries with whom he comes in touch in his work; for this reason it will be of value to him. The service was held in the 56th St. Church because Bro. Butchart was a member of that congregation while a student in this city.

At the close of the service the pulpit supply committee recommended to the congregation that Bro. B. Q. Denham, of North Tonawanda, be elected pastor of that church. Action was taken and resulted in a practically unanimous call to Bro. Denham, who will become pastor of the West 56th St. Church October 1 next. According to report, Bro. Denham has done good work at North Tonawanda, and we sincerely hope he may be able to win many souls to the Lord in New York City. It is a good field and demands hurculean strength, great patience and tact, and an inexhaustible supply of mental and spiritual power. Success to Bro. Denham and the 56th St. congregation.

The New York district of the C. W. B. M. held its quarterly meeting at the 56th St. Church on the afternoon and evening of June 13, when Sister Rummell, the new president of the district, presided in a pleasing manner, and the secretaries of the various auxiliaries made encouraging reports. Mrs. Lindsay, former organizer of New York, and Mrs. S. T. Willis made suggestive talks on the local work of the C. W. B. M., and Mrs. Encell conducted a question box to the delight of all. Tea was served by the ladies between sessions, when all enjoyed an hour of social fellowship. At the evening session Bro. Denham made an address on what he designated "The Trinity of Missions." The services were well attended and inspiring. The woman's work is in good condition.

A religious ccmpaign was begun yesterday in several of the parks in Bronx Borough, to continue on Sunday afternoons all summer. They are in the hands of the local pastors, who will conduct their several services according to their own choosing, providing in each instance their own helpers in the services. The services are held at five o'clock in the afternoon in Crotona, Van Cortlandt and Bronx Parks. It is hoped that much good will be done in this way. A four months' campaign was begun yesterday also in a tent at Broadway and 56th St., where services will be held every day except Saturdays. Dr. A. C. Dixon, the famous Baptist evangelist, will take a prominent part in these services. Mr. Moody also will take part in them in July. Christian people should plan to assault Satan in the summer months, for frequently he gets in his best work when Christian activity is at the ebb-tide.

Bishop F. D. Huntington, of the diocese of Central New York, before a convention of his bishoprio at Oswego recently, attacked Prof. Briggs and Bishop Potter in this language: "An unshrinking attempt by an ordained minister to fix terms of contempt, ridicule, incredulity upon the matchless and singular volume which has declared itself through ages, without effectual dispute, to be the Word of God, which has been handled with awe in the highest seats of law and courts of judgment, which has been pressed with adoring gratitude to the breasts of martyrs, saints, statesmen and seers, which has saturated litanies, missals, prayer books, altar anthems and august obsequies, with its unearthly spirit, and glorified them with its grandeur, could have been only offensive by its impertinence and amazing by its audacity.

"Nothing can persuade me that any bishop of the Church of God can be compelled to lay ordaining hands for the Christian priesthood, by any known law of God or the Church, on any man he deems unworthy of the office and its sanctities—the church continuing to pray at the ember season for all bishops, that they may faithfully and wisely make choice of fit persons to serve in the sacred ministry of the church. What kind of men would accept the office if there were such compulsion?"

The congregation on 169th St. had the pleasure of listening to an excellent discourse on Lord's day morning last, from Bro. James Marsden, of England, who is sojourning in New York on business. Bro. Marsden is not a regular minister, but a business man, whose deep interest in the cause of Christ, like his grand old father-in-law, Bro. Timothy Coop, leads him to speak wherever duty calls. I sincerely wish there were many more business men in our churches like Bro. Marsden, ready to speak with acceptance when opportunity might offer. A circle of young man at Pittsburg has been formed under Bro. Latimer to make themselves useful in extending the kingdom of Christ in that city. We need such companies of young business men in all our centers of population.

Chicago Letter.

VIA HEADQUARTERS OF THE C. W. B. M.

Leaving Chicago via the Big Four, I spent one day in Indianapolis en route to Charlottesville, Va. I found Mrs. Burgess, president of the C. W. B. M., who is constantly gaining strength, preparing for a trip to Hiram, where she will be the guest of Mrs. McDairmid. Her sister, Miss Mary Ledgewood, accompanied her. Mrs. Burgess is planning even more vigorously than ever to lead the C. W. B. M. into the accomplishment of larger things for Christ and consecrated womanhood. The new headquarters of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions is much better suited to the growing work of the board than the old location. I found the office force hard at work. Over fifteen hundred letters per month pass through the office. I spent a pleasant night at Irvington, the seat of Butler College, one of the most thoroughly equipped and the best endowed college in our brotherhood. I was the guest of Mr. Van Meter Ames. His parents, Prof. E. A. Ames, and Mrs. Ames assisted in making my visit enjoyable.

From Indianapolis I went to Charlottesville, Va., where I attended the finals of the University of Virginia, and planned for a large delegation from that point to the Jubilee Convention, over the Chesapeake and Ohio R. R. The C. & O. is one of the finest scenic routes in America and we hope to have one hundred delegates from Virginia alone to our great Jubilee Convention. I was authorized by Mr. Bronson, of the C. & O., to state to our secretaries in Cincinnati that while the C. & O. would be governed by the decision of the Eastern Pass. Ass'n, in regard to rates, the prospects for a one-fare rate for round trip from Virginia points was very bright. The New York and New England delegations will probably join us in Virginia. We are planning to have a special train from Washington to Cincinnati over the C. & O. Let those who expect to attend the Jubilee Convention on the Atlantic Seaboard write S. T. Willis, of New York City, or E. B. Bagby, of Washington, D. C. We must not fail to have ten thousand delegates at the Jubilee Convention.

CHARLOTTESVILLE AND THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

Reaching Charlottesville in time for the communion service on Lord's day I was very much pleased with the evidences of the growth and prosperity of the University of Virginia. Through the wise fostering care of the late John B. Cary and the generosity of Sister Columbia H. Cary the C. W. B. M. have succeeded in establishing a permanent English Bible Lectureship at the seat of this very important educational center. The success of our Charlottesville Bible work is also largely due to the untiring efforts of Dr. Charles W. Kent, Prof. of English Literature in the Univerity of Virginia. Those who desire to study New Testament Greek or Hebrew, as well as the English Bible, while pursuing their B. A. or M. A. work may do so at the University of Virginia. No tuition in the University is required of students who give satisfactory evidence that they expect to preach the gospel.

The Christian brotherhood have every reason to rejoice over the growth of the "Christianity according to Christ" in the capital of our nation. Reaching Washington, D. C., Saturday afternoon, the Bishop of Washington and Bro. Bagby met the Chicago Letter writer at the train. Saturday night I had a conference with brethren Power, Wright and Bagby in regard to the Whitney Avenue Memorial Church. The trustees of this church, holding property worth fully seven thousand five hundred dollars, proposed to turn this property over to the Disciples of Christ on the simple condition that we assume the responsibility of building up the cause of the Master in that part of Washington City. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions will contribute eight hundred dollars per annum to the support of a pastor for this important work. This makes the fourth church in Wathington, D. C. Nothing better illustrates the importance of long pastorates than the "dropping of this ripe plum" into the hands of the Christian Churches of Washington. Twenty-two years ago Bro. F. D. Power dedicated the Whitney Avenue Memorial Union Chapel. Since then the various denominations have kept up a union Sunday-school until the trustees belonging to the Lutheran, Presbyterian and other denominations decided that a more positive Christian work should be accomplished, and they naturally turned to Bro. Power for counsel. This will be our fourth church in Washington, fostered by the wise missionary spirit of F. D. Power.

F. D. Power is a graduate of Bethany College. He preached in Charlottesville, Virginia, from January to September, in 1874. He had seventy-five faithful members. In March, 1874, he was married. As he only received thirty-three dollars a month from the Charlottesville church, which was supplemented by preaching one Lord's day each month at Gilboa, he soon run out of funds and had to hold a "protracted meeting" to balance up. Fortunately he held this meeting for the Macedonian church, for which he received what then seemed a munificent sum, amounting to eighty dollars. In 1875 Bro. Power was Professor of Languages in Bethany College. From there he went to Washington, D. C., where he has been preaching for twenty-four years. Then we had about one hundred and fifty members worshiping in the little frame church. Now we have over seventeen hundred members in Washington, three good pastors, property valued at over one hundred thousand dollars and a fourth church just budding out hansomely. E. B. Bagby went to supplement Bro. Power's work in 1891. He graduated at Lexington, Ky., in 1887, and graduated from the Yale Divinity School in 1890. He spent one year in evangelizing before assuming control of the work on Ninth Street. From a little band of sixty-five members his congregation has grown to seven hundred and fifty strong. They now have a fine church property, valued at thirty-five thousand dollars. Space will not permit me to speak at length of the excellent work of Bro. Wright.

While in Washington Bro. Bagby and I had a conference with some of the officials of the C. & O. R. R. Several of the delegation have already decided upon this route for the Jubilee Convention. In my next letter I shall speak of my visit to Cincinnati and the prospects of our Jubilee Convention. Let us work for one million dollars and ten thousand delegates to report in October.

"The Dash of Sam Dash."

I rejoice that Bro. McGarvey in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of June 1 has taken notice of my article of May 18. Not because it was "Sam Dash" who wrote it, or Jack Robinson, but because it called attention to some things which I thought needed ventilation, and contained some truths which I considered worthy of reflection. I can congratulate Bro. McGarvey on at least one thing in his notice; and that is, marked humility in one if not in more directions. The bland assumption that the chief part of the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST are ignorant of his writings and their tendency manifests this humility in a remarkable manner. If he really believes this, I am sorry; if it is only some of his dry humor, I am duly amused. Bro. McGarvey may rest assured that if the chief part of the readers of the Standard do not read the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, the chief part of the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST do read the Standard, and they are well up on his effusions and their general drift. Besides, Bro. McGarvey's views have been expressed over and over again in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST direct. If I have been guilty of a technical discourtesy in criticizing Bro. McGarvey under a fictitious signature, as he avers, I did it ignorantly and can congratulate myself that this criticism in the main was intended to be favorable and was entirely without malice. If I have spoken in an "oracular way," as Bro. McGarvey asserts, it is because I have read closely after him and supposed he could understand that language, as he evidently has done. I do not care how much I have lost by not signing my own name so long as the cause of truth or good fellowship has gained some, if ever so little. I evidently do not write thus for my own glory. I am glad to have given Bro. McGarvey and the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST an opportunity to become better acquainted, and trust he will no longer "do good by stealth and blush to find it fame," and that he will avail himself of every opportunity to put the readers and himself right on the many substantial as well as the superficial subjects which are now pressing for settlement.

I may add, by way of conclusion (if it is not discourteous), that the doughty professor has confirmed his well-established reputation for Scotch-Irish sagacity and long-headed shrewdness, by silently slipping over the hard points of my article of May 18. I asked him if he endorsed the articles taken from the Standard's editorial columns. He has not answered that question, and now I ask, Why has he not done so? By answering that question he would have put himself in a much better attitude before the thinking brethren than by slashing away at such a nobody as he conceives me in his great humility to be. Since the Standard has dropped the big "D" and taken on the big "I" and little "u," it was hardly to be expected that it would notice my desire for enlightenment as to its "apparent retrogression," but as Bro. McGarvey deigned to notice me it is to be regretted that he has ignored entirely my longing for the truth; personal vindication seeming to be of more importance with him than the vindication of the truth. Attend to your knitting, Professor! The question is, "Do you indorse those Standard articles?" not "Who is Sam Dash?"

SAM DASH.

The Nashville Churches.

When the writer was at the Disciples' Congress in St. Louis, recently, Bro. Frank Merriman remarked that as he passed through our city some months ago he bought a Nashville paper, and on looking at the church announcements he was very agreeably surprised to see more than a dozen places of worship among our people. In the latter part of the third decade of this century, Philip S. Fall came to Nashville as pastor of the Baptist Church. He was not here very long before the church for which he preached became an undenominational Church of Christ—a Christian Church.

There remained only the one congregation in the city, till a little more than twenty years ago, when a few brethren on the east side of of the river, which runs through the city, organized a church there. Not a great while after that another church was formed in the southern end of the city. These three churches have branched out, till now there are at least fourteen congregations, each with a good house of worship. They are as follows:

First Christian Church, on Vine St., for which P. S. Fall, Jesse B. Ferguson, S. A. Kelley, R. C. Cave and R. Lin Cave have preached, and for which W. E. Ellis ministers now; the church on North Spruce St.; the church on Scovel St.; one in West Nashville, for which young Bro. Jackson (a student at the Nashville Bible Shool) preaches; the Line St. Church, L. M. Jackson (brother to the last-named), pastor; there is a church at the Bible School, where they have regular services for people living in that neighborhood; the Green St. Church, J. G. Allen, pastor; College St. Church, T. A. Moore, pastor; Carroll St Church, Highland Avenue Church, Woodland St. Church, T. A. Reynolds, pastor; Foster St. Church, 10th St. Church and 17th St. Church, for which the writer preaches—fourteen in all. In addition to these organizations there are three missions, viz., Buena Vista, Kayne Avenue and Jackson's Hall missions.

As near as I can tell, there are about 3,500 to 4,000 Disciples in Nashville.

Three of these churches, viz., Vine Street, Woodland Street and 17th Street have organs and take collections for missionary enterprises, under the auspices of organized missionary boards. The other eleven are under the influence of brethren who regard organs and missionary societies as sinful, and hence do not have anything to do with these things.

The congregation on 10th Street is just completing a beautiful brick building. They expect to occupy it in a very few weeks.

The following brethren have bean pastors of Woodland Street Church: W. J. Loos, R. M. Giddens, H. S. Earl, W. R. Lloyd and T. A. Reynolds. The latter has just resigned, but will remain till Oct. 1. I understand that Bro. Reynolds has not accepted any other work yet. He recently assisted the writer in a meeting at 17th Street Church, at which there were six added to the Lord by primary obedience.

This is a small suburban church, for which the writer has been pastor for about a year. There were seven members at the time. In a few months, six were added, making what some people regard an unlucky number. But I do not believe it is unlucky to add six souls to the Lord, even if it does make thirteen in all. We did not want to be unlucky, and so in a short time two more were added. Then the six added at the recent meeting made twenty-one, just three times what we began with. We have taken up collections for State, Home and Foreign Missions and do not want a missionary day to come around without making an offering.

The cause is looking up in Nashville, and if I mistake not we are the second people numerically among the Protestant bodies of Nashville. The M. E. Church South outnumbers us.

MICAH COMBS.

Nashville, Tenn.

The little Dutch boy who stopped the leak in the dike with his finger saved his country from overwhelming destruction. You have read about him in your school readers, how he was walking along the dike when he heard a faint sound of trickling water, and knew at once that a leak had sprung in that great embankment which saves Holland from the devastations of the hungry sea. It was early in the night, and no one was near at hand. The leak was small when he found it, but he knew that the action of the water would enlarge it long before morning, and wash away the entire embankment, inundate the country and destroy his own and thousands of homes. So he bravely put his finger in the crevasse, and kept it there all the long night through, until help came and the opening was properly stopped. He had saved his country.

Equally insignificant is the entrance of disease into the human system. The beginnings of the most terrible ailments are so small they can be easily stopped at the start. Your health is a dike which keeps out and stops the inroads of dangerous and devastating disease. Whenever it breaks down, no matter how slightly, there is an opening for disease to enter. If the opening is not watched, it will grow larger, until the sweep of disease overwhelms you, and health and perhaps life is destroyed forever.

Fortify your health with Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and you can defy ill-health. You can make your health so strong a bulwark that disease cannot find a crevice through which it can creep. Taken in time, Dr. Pierce's remedies prevent greater and more serious troubles. Hundreds write daily to Dr. Pierce, telling him how these remedies have saved them and made them strong.

Constipation causes and aggravates many serious diseases. It is speedily cured by Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets.

Bethany College Commencement.

The commencement season at Bethany College this year has been a particularly happy and hopeful one. Model commencement weather has prevailed during the entire week from Sunday on to Thursday, and our friends have even been favored with fine weather to go home in. It is not proposed to give a detailed report this week. The presence of second president of the college, W. K. Pendleton, venerable and gracious, and that of the new president, J. M. Kersey, vigorous, hopeful and inspiring, were notable features of the occasion. We are told that the number of visitors from a distance was larger than for some years past, and it is but expressing the sober truth to say that they went to their homes feeling assured that the future of Bethany College is to be a glorious one under the blessing of God, and that the old college is destined in the coming years in an increasing measure to realize the grand ideas of her founder and to further the great cause which dominated his life and directed his energies.

The New England Convention.

The 34th annual convention of the Disciples of Christ in New England was held June 9-11, in Haverhill, Mass., where our young brother, E. M. Flinn, ministers. In many respects it was the best convention we ever held. Never before in the history of our people in New England were there so many delegates present. The church at Haverhill is small. They, however, did their part well. The entertainment of so many guests was no easy task, but it takes Yankees to overcome difficulties. The kindness, hospitality and Christian love of pastor and people were truly appreaciated. We may be lacking now in numbers in the East, but we are full of enthusiasm and zeal (with knowledge, we trust,) in the great work of the restoration of the primitive gospel. Then, too, we believe, we have among us some of the best and most consecrated workers in the world. Our local talent is of the best quality, and we have enough of it to make a convention very interesting. There is Roland A. Nichols, of Worcester, Mass., our president; E. Jay Teagarden, of Danbury, Conn.; E. C. Davis, of Springfield, Mass.; T. G. Picton, of East Machias, Me.; J. H. Mohorter, of Boston, Mass., recently of Cleveland, Ohio; A. L. D. Buxton, of Worcester, Mass.; Harry Minnick, of Lubec, Maine; R. E. Jope, of South Gardner, Me.; E. M. Flinn, of Haverhill, Mass.; R. H. Bolton, of Everett, Mass., editor and publisher of the N. E. Messenger; Wilmer Monroe, of Bridgeport, Conn.; Dr. H. L. McClusky, of Worcester, Mass., and B. N. Tanner, of West Paulet, Vt., all of whom took part in the convention and did their part well. Both Bro, Nichols and Bro. E. Jay Teagarden, who presided at the morning services on Lord's day, during the absence of our president, with grace and dignity. Bro. Minnick read a paper on "The Under Shepherd and his Flock." It was so well liked that it was decided to have it published in tract form for the benefit of the brethren.

I would not fail to make mention of our good sisters, without whom any convention would be a failure. The session of the C. W. B. M., presided over by Mrs. Newton Knox, of Worcester, Mass., was most interesting. The papers read and the addresses made by the different sisters were instructive and helpful.

The reports from the different churches were most encouraging.

Brethren, we have made greater progress during the past year than ever before. With Worcester in the lead, there has been an advance all along the line. Great things have been accomplished, but not without great sacrifices. Ah, to have heard of some of the sacrifices made would have quickened your faith and convinced you, I am sure, that the brotherhood in New England was in earnest. $500 was raised during the meetings by our good brother S. M. Hunt, corresponding secretary of New England. He is one of the "biggest beggars" in the country, yet one of our most loved brethren. His services are indispensable to the work in the Northeast.

Besides our local talent, the convention was blessed by the presence of some of our most worthy brethren from abroad. There was Dr. W. A. Belding, whose counsel is always timely, whose presence is inspiring, whose life is a benediction. He is an annual visitor. He appreciates good things. There was Bro. A. McLean, our esteemed corresponding secretary of the Foreign Missionary Society. He gave two most excellent addresses. It is needless to say that they were highly enjoyed. Bro. McLean has a way of saying things that goes to the very heart of man. Then there was our good Bro. C. C. Smith, of the "Home Board." In the very beginning he gave us to understand that he was neither the son of Raccoon Smith nor the brother of B. L. Smith. That some were disappointed is evident, yet such can console themselves over the fact that he is at least a member of the great Smith family. His address and sermons were very interesting—full of good things. It is a great help for any convention to have two such men as Bro. McLean and Bro. C. C. Smith present. They help "Missions to the front" where they belong.

Moreover, we have with us a real live missionary—Dr. James Butchart, of Lu Cheo Fu, China, who, in a very interesting way, told us his story of seven years of hard work in the land of the Chinaman. His discoveries were greatly appreciated.

The provinces were represented by Bro. W. H. Harding, who delivered a very fine, address on "The Value of Decision Day" in the absence of Bro. Nowton Knox, of Worcester, Mass.

We were especially favored with an address on "Christian Endeavor Ideals" by Mr. Wm. Shaw, of Christian Endeavor fame. This is a good sign. Such recognition is always pleasant.

The following were elected officers of the N. E. C. M. S. for one year: President, Roland A. Nichols, Worcester, Mass.; 1st vice-president, E. Jay Teagarden, Danbury, Conn.; 2nd vice-president, E. C. Davis, Springfield, Mass.; recording secretary, T. G. Picton, East Michias, Me.; corresponding secretary, S. M. Hunt, Springfield, Mass.; treasurer, J. H. Mohorter, Boston, Mass.; auditor, A. L. O. Buxton, Worcester, Mass.; superintendent of C. E., Dr. H. L. McClusky, Worcester, Mass.; Secretary Ministerial Educational Fund, G. A. Reinl, Brockton, Mass.

It was with sorrow we learned of Bro. Minnick's resignation of the Lubec churches. He is one of our best preachers. Has held his pastorate over twelve years, during which time he has done much for our cause, not only in Maine, but for our entire New England work. His people do not want to let him go. He shall be missed by us all when he leaves.

We rejoice, however, in that Bro. J. H. Mohorter, of Cleveland, Ohio, has settled among us as pastor of the Boston church. He is a strong man. His past experience is such, he will be of great help to our work in the East.

Pres. Graham's Remarks at Father Sweeney's Funeral.

Bro. Graham said in part: The Christian religion is distinguished from all others worthy the name for the clearness of its revelation of a future life and the certainty of its proof. At a time like this when we are confronted with an instance of our mortality, the Prophet of Nazareth alone can minister the consolation our hearts need.

It hath pleased God to close the long and useful career of our dear Father Sweeney in great peace and in full hope of a blissful immortality at the advanced age of 92 years, and in his departure I can see little to be deplored; he had finished his course, he had kept the faith, he has gone home to reap the reward of an able and faithful minister of Jesus Christ, loved by his family and the church and respected by all who knew him.

Still, in severing the ties that bind us to one another in this mortal state, we cannot always restrain our tears, and were it not for the assurance of eternal life beyond the grave our grief would indeed be inconsolable; here it is that our holy religion comes to us with its divine proofs of immortality which reconcile us to our lot and arms us to meet the doubts and fears that shrouded the ancients in despair. They could not gather the support the soul needs in the hour of its dissolution by reasoning upon the few and indistinct intimations of a future life drawn from nature in any or all her glorious works in the mineral, vegetable and animal kingdoms around us, or in the more wonderful constitution of the mental and moral nature within us. The analogies of matter and mind yielded only here and there, and to few superior spirits, a ground of inference; but it was only inference, and that, too, drawn through probable reasonings and deductions on the part of logicians and philosophers. The masses of men were unaffected by them; they had no force, or very little, in the formation of character or the purification of life; this was reserved for him who was God manifested in flesh and who brought life and immortality to light by the gospel.

Neither from nature nor from reason can those who reject revelation have any well-grounded assurance that death does not end all; and if we turn from these to our moral nature and argue from conscience and the demands of natural justice, we learn but little more to sustain us in the supreme crisis of life. It is true, we have a longing for immortality, and a future life may be necessary to compensate for the hardship and injustice which press so heavily upon millions of our race; still, this also is but an inference, and while it may be reasonable to suppose that our Creator would make provision to satisfy this aspiration of the heart and thus reinforce the teaching of Scripture, it remains for the inspiration of prophets and apostles to reveal and the resurrection of Jesus to demonstrate the reality of the life to come. The first we have in the Living Oracles, the last in the words of him who alone could say, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." And again, "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you to myself, that where I am you may be also."

May this faith that marked the life of this aged servant of God sustain and comfort his friends and relatives in this hour of bereavement, and especially may it be so for you, his three sons here present, who are all preachers of the gospel. You have often ministered its consolations to others in the trying scenes of life; may these consolations now be yours till you, also, be called to the rest that remains for the people of God, where he shall gather you and us to the fellowship of the redeemed in another and brighter world! G. W. S.

Do You Advocate Temperance

Then you should advocate everything that advances the growth of temperance. HIRES Rootbeer is strictly a temperance drink. It is helpful to the cause of temperance because it takes the place of stimulating beverages.

HIRES Rootbeer

is not a stimulant. It is a pure, delicious health giving drink for home making and home drinking, as harmless as pure spring water. A package makes 5 gallons.

HIRES Rootbeer Carbonated, ready for drinking, sold everywhere by the bottle and case. Write and ask how a boy can make from 40 cents to $4.50 a day. A beautiful picture book of rhymes free.

Impressions from the Bible-school Convention at Plattsburg, Mo.

When I looked over the vast audiences that assembled day after day in the Plattsburg church and asked myself, Why are they here? and when I realized that all these men and women, representing every district of Missouri, had assembled because they loved the children and hoped to draw them closer to the heart of Jesus, a blur of tears came to my eyes, and looking through that mist all faces became beautiful. It was as if I saw shining through the rain God's rainbow of promise upon the countenances of the delegates. This was my first impression of the Bible-school convention. Perhaps it was because this was the first convention of its kind I had ever attended. But it seems to me that the speeches and papers were all secondary matters; the great fact was that we were together, and if we had only grasped each others' hand and looked into each others' eyes, then gone our separate ways so far apart, but all leading to the same home, the important result would have been produced. And now that we look back it is not the distinctive merits of such discourses as those of S. D. Dutcher, O. W. Lawrence, F. M. Rains, J. H. Wood, J. C. Creel—excellent as these and many others were—that we most vividly recall. It is the throng of loving listeners, their eyes glowing with enthusiasm and their hands ready to applaud every sentiment looking toward the upbuilding of the Bible-school. We had symposiums on "Our Obligation to the Child," "Superintendents and Superintending," "Teachers and Teaching," "Relation between Church and School," "Advance in Christian Endeavor," led by Davis Errett, D. W. Moore, W. F. Richardson, T. S. Ridge. But when Mrs. Conway, of St. Louis, taught an infant class upon the platform, while the beautiful building, crowded to its galleries, looked on, a climax was reached toward which all other events were shaped. The exercises were as simple, as tender and as natural as a little child. And it seemed to me that the thought of the convention then burst into bloom.

I was impressed by the harmony that prevailed, the youth of many of the preachers, the disposition they showed of making little trouble, their gratitude for our treatment of them, the general spirit of happiness that moved them to smiles and laughter. I think no assembly were ever happier and at the same time more in earnest. The convention lasted four days if the Endeavor day is included, beginning June 12th. The great majority sat through every session, they realized that it was not a pleasure outing, and they spent little time in our parks and zoological gardens. And I do not believe they would have done so had we possessed parks and gardens. This is saying a great deal for the assembly, because usually we preachers do not like to listen to other people's papers. C. H. Winders made a graceful and efficient president and C. C. Hill was nominated as a worthy successor. There was an interesting skirmish over the place of the next meeting. California won the day with honors. About $2,000 were raised for state work; over $50 for the sufferes of Kirksville, in whose behalf Simpson Ely made a touching appeal; over $50 for the Mitchell Park Church, of St. Joseph, which owns no building of its own, and is the only organization of our brotherhood in a population of 24,000. W. A. Webster, who helped to start this mission church, presented its needs as the only church ever started and maintained by Christian Endeavorers. His address is 604 Felix Street, St. Joseph, and he hopes our C. E. Societies will take up this work as their first missionary enterprise. S. J. White, in a paper on the Spirituality of Endeavorers, warmly recommended the Bethany C. E. Courses and told the good it had accomplished. Mrs. A. M. Duckworth had a splendid paper on "Recruiting Pupils." She did not devote her time to telling how nice it would be to get more pupils, but in giving her actual experience in getting, and what is much more to the purpose, in keeping them.

Some especially earnest and practical talks on Bible-school work were made by E. B. Redd, R. H. Waggener, W. E. Woodson, E. W. Thornton. Two addresses which produced profound impressions were those of F. M. Rains and H. A. Denton. The speech of the latter was printed in our daily paper; it aroused great enthusiasm. This was unusual, because it was read from the manuscript, and instead of advocating new plans, new societies and fads of any kind, it merely emphasized consecration and fidelity to Christian duty. Until I heard this address I believed that a discourse lost much of its effect when read; I now suspect that it depends a good deal on what is written in the manuscript. Mr. and Mrs. Hockaday gave the lawn in front of their house to the convention, and many availed themselves of the benches and other comforts there offered. I am especially pleased to make a note of this since they are kinfolks. Since this is not an official report, but simply a bundle of impressions, I see no reason why I should not bring myself into it. I was greatly impressed by the fact that nearly all the delegates were reading the children's page in this paper. Many brought me greetings from children whom I have never seen. This indicated to my mind, not especially that the department is a good one, but that the very fact of there being a page just given up to children, pleases all grown-up people. And while I am striking this personal note, why should I not say how pleased I was to meet some of my old friends again? Bro. Haley, my preacher when I lived in St. Louis, and Bro. Procter, whom I knew so well in Independence, were here. It was not only a pleasure to see them among us, but a benefit, for upon their faces shone the light of many triumphs in the cause of Christ. One of the best classified reports was read by Miss Mollie Hughes. Bro. Stutzman led Endeavor Day with zest and ability. The Junior Endeavor Societies of Cameron and Plattsburg gave exercises and won new laurels.

I was impressed by the amount of space the St. Louis people occupied on the program and the number of persons who had to be found to occupy their vacant places on the platform. I was impressed by the almost unanimous determination of the speakers to get in "along this line," somewhere in their discourses, as if they were making a choice of railroads, and how everybody spoke of being "enthused," just as if the word were in the dictionary. I was impressed by the rain several times, but we made a dash for the church building between showers and we had one dry day. Dinner and supper was provided the delegates at a hall down-town; there were 456 delegates. The only regret of the Plattsburg ladies was that it was not a national convention, so they could feed more people and fill more of their homes. They had looked forward for weeks to the meeting (need I say with glee?) and it was even better than they had anticipated. We had splendid singers and leaders with us; Bros. Ely, Millard, Abbott, Errett, Troutman, Kelso, J. H. Wood, of Shelbina (in which town there are two members of the Advance Society), delivered the farewell address and at its close the convention, reluctant to part, lingered to a late hour expressing their delight with Plattsburg homes and their appreciation of the convention. Speaking of the farewell address naturally reminds me of the address of welcome. Of course, it was by my preacher, T. H. Capp, and he delighted his audience. If I should say, "Hurrah for Bro. Capp!" I would merely be expressing, I hope, the feeling of every Christian for his local preacher. Hurrah for Bro. Capp! As to who got the banners and medals, H. F. Davis will have to tell about that. Of course, he was here with one of the friendliest faces and the busiest duties, but never too busy to be friendly. I had not thought of "writing up the convention" until a letter came yesterday requesting me to do so. Had I begun by saying that my time for preparation was inadequate I would have been very much in the fashion. It makes a good way to begin, and it gets your hopes down so low that the least heave will raise them a little. I can only say that this is written on the spur of the moment, without preparation and with many interruptions, among them a piano tuner, and this will explain to you in some measure why this sketch is so good! And in conclusion, and that I may voice the sentiments of the speakers, allow me to add, that my article may be rounded up and sound well—"Along this line."

Educational Day and Our Colleges

Educational Day—July 2.

I call attention of preachers and others to matter published by the Board of Education during the year. This is,

(1) The Educational Bulletin containing the address of Pres. E. V. Zollars at the Chattanooga Convention.

(2) The Educational Number of the American Home Missionary.

The space of the June issue has been kindly granted us by Bro. B. L. Smith and the Home Board. It contains the address of Pres. J. H. Hardin at the Congress of Disciples of Christ at St. Louis. These two are the best statements of the college problem among the Disciples of Christ that has come to my notice. I hope they will be read and reread, and their appeal will go home to the hearts of the brethren.

I also call attention to the article, Leading Facts About our Schools, found in the June number of the American Home Missionary. This is a short statement by some member of each college faculty, setting forth its history, the graduates it has given the world, its present faculty, its equipment, its financial condition, etc. Here is actual authentic data for preachers to know what our schools have done, what they are able to do and what are their needs in order to fulfill their mission. I have not been able to get statements from all the colleges. I regret their absence. Others came in too late to be inserted in the magazine. These I append below. HIRAM VANKIRK, Christian College, Columbia, Mo.

HISTORY.

The first charter ever granted by the Legislature of Missouri for the collegiate education of Protestant women was that which incorporated Christian College, Columbia, Missouri, Jan. 18, 1851.

In November. 1849, Dr. Samuel Hatch and Prof. Henry H. White, of Bacon College, Harrodsburg, Ky., came to Columbia with a view of inaugurating a "Female Collegiate Institute" of the highest grade. They, in connection with D. P. Henderson and James Shannon, LL.D., who was in 1849 elected to the presidency of Missouri University, successfully carried the project into execution and on the recommendation of Dr. Shannon, John Augustus Williams, of Kentucky, was elected the first president of the newly founded institution. A small house in the town was at first used, but so rapidly did the school grow that its friends were encouraged to secure the necessary buildings. The incompleted residence and twenty-nine acres of ground belonging to the estate of Dr. J. S. Bennet were purchased in 1851 and the building was opened for the regular session in September of the same year. To the original structure, designed as a private residence, have been added during the last 46 years improvements and buildings which make the present college edifice one of the most commodious in the West.

Mr. Williams was succeeded as president in 1856 by L. B. Wilkes, the original financial agent. Mr. Wilkes' administration only extended over a period of two years, but during that time he did very much towards putting the college in the forefront among the leading institutions of the West. His successor, President J. K. Rogers, completed the work thus begun and during twenty years governed the institution with wisdom and success. Several times during the war the Union soldiers bivouaced near the college buildings, but whilst other institutions closed their doors President Rogers allowed neither war nor anything else to drive him from his post. He made a name both for himself and Christian College which will live in the annals of the state.

President Rogers was succeeded on his death by Prof. G. S. Bryant, of Independence, Mo., and the latter resigned in 1884 in favor of W. A. Oldham, of Lexington, Ky. President Oldham was succeeded in 1893 by Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair, the first lady president of Christian College and probably the youngest lady president in the United States. Mrs. St. Clair's administration was one of complete success, during which she changed a young ladies' seminary into a high-class college for young women with modern methods and aims. In 1897 she was compelled to resign on account of ill health and she was succeeded by another lady, Mrs. W. T. Moore, the wife of Dr. W. T. Moore, dean of the Bible College of Missouri.

The success of the college has been so great during the two years of Mrs. Moore's administration that many have been turned away for lack of room and Mrs. Moore and Mrs. St. Clair unite their forces in June, 1899, erecting new buildings throughout and carrying on the work together for the future. These two noble women will make the education of our daughters their life work and will provide every facility and equipment morally, mentally and physically.

SECRETARY CHRISTIAN COLLEGE.

Eugene Divinity School, Eugene, Ore.

HISTORY.

This growing institution, located in the city of Eugene, and adjacent to the campus of the University of Oregon, with which its relations are most cordial, had its inception in the fertile brain of the present dean, E. C. Sanderson, through whose efforts mainly the school has been brought to its present state of efficiency. In the autumn of 1895 articles of incorporation were obtained with J. W. Cowls, W. H. Osborn, J. H. Hawley, J. A. Bushnell, J. D. Matlock, J. T. Callison and P. J. Flint as a board of regents. The school opened October 6th, 1895, in a rented but commodious building, the attendance being very satisfactory. The foundation of a library was laid this year, which has steadily grown until it contains several hundred volumes.

The fourth year, 1898-9, now drawing to a close, has been in every way satisfactory. During the summer of 1896 the opportunity of acquiring a splendid plat of ground adjoining the University campus presented itself and was promptly taken advantage of by the board, upon which has been erected a good building at a cost of over $5,000.

The property now represents about $7,000, and is all paid for.

These things were made possible by the liberal donation of Mrs. L. E. Cowls, widow of the late Judge Cowls, of McMinnville. He was one of the first regents and gave the first financial encouragement to the school. At his death Mrs. Cowls was elected to succeed him as regent, and gave $1,400 toward the new building, one part of which is the "Cowls Memorial Chapel." She has since given an endowment note of $2,500, as a nucleus for the school's permanent endowment. Others have added to this fund. Through bequests and other gifts this fund will continually grow and increase the power of the school in the Lord's work. From this school will go forth in coming years scores of young men fully equipped to preach the pure Word of God.

FIELD.

There is no similar institution of the Christian Church within 600 miles of Eugene. Cut off on the east by lofty mountains, on the north by the Dominion, on the west by the rolling billows, it stands a faithful exponent of Bible theology and primitive Christianity. And without tuition and within one block are all the advantages offered by the University of Oregon. Great cities are already built and many more to be built within this radius. It is an empire erected by nature. Millions of people will till her soil and bring her precious metals from her mountain sides. Thousands will attend her fishing industries. Her splendid climate and productive soil reach out to every land of immigrants. This all tells of work for an educated ministry. The Eugene Divinity School is our means at hand for the drilling of native sons and daughters for the saving of this vast region for the Christ.

W. R. HOLLENBECK.

In a letter recently to hand from Dr. W. T. Moore, Columbia, Mo., he presents the following encouraging outlook for Christian College:

The new building for Christian College is now going up rapidly. Additional room in the dormitory department for sixty young ladies will be ready by Sept. 1, and the whole building will be completed by Jan. 1; so that everything will be ready for the second semester of the next collegiate year. The prospect is most flattering for an overflowing of the boarding department. Indeed, without an early application there is no certainty that room can be secured. We have at least one college which has no reason to complain for want of patronage.

Notes and News.

The Children's Day offering at Mechanicsburg, Ill., June 4, was $17.05.

Children's Day offering at West Lima, Mo., was in all $22. A. Sterling is the pastor.

The second annual meeting of the Western Montana Christian Association was held at Corvalis, June 20-25.

The offering of the church in Nora Springs, Iowa, this year, for Foreign Missions, was more than trebled. All the church activeities are in a healthful state under the pastoral care of W. W. Wharton.

Preachers or congregations uot listed in the "Southern Illinois" list, but who reside or labor within this territory, please notify the writer at once, as we wish to perfect the roll before the annual convention which meets at Flora, Clay Co., July 19-21. Address until convention box 226, Cowden, Ill.

W. BEDALL, Cor. Sec.

An echo from the great meeting at Jacksonville, Fla., confirms the magnitude and stability of the work recently accomglished there. Bro. Martin is held in high esteem as a preacher of ability and the pastor, J. T. Boone, and his wife are loved for their consecrated living and work. There have been 13 additions to the church since the meeting.

H. C. Varner, who has now been six months at St. Francis, Kan., reports the church in a prosperous state. House repaired, a new bell, vestibule and belfrey, and six additions to the membership, are some of the evidences of the healthy state of the church.

The new church at Lewiston, Idaho, was dedicated June 12, by F. B. Sapp, of Tacoma, Wash. The church is a beautiful structure, with a seating capacity of 200 persons and cost about $1,700. J. O. Davis is the pastor. The services were greatly enjoyed by the people and the church is exceedingly proud of its new home.

The Maysville Chautauqua, Maysville, Mo., has published an extensive and attractive program for its season, August 11 to 21 inclusive. The program is made up of addresses, music, etc., of a high order. Send to J. T. Stewart, secretary, for a program or other information.

We have received a copy of the Fountain Park Assembly, Remington, Ind., Aug. 5 to 20, and find the outline of an excellent and profitable season. Some of the noted speakers mentioned for the occasion are F. D. Power, Z. T. Sweeney, Chas. B. Neunau, Burris A. Jenkins, Jno. E. Pounds, Jessie Brown Pounds and a host of others. A new Christian Church is being built in Remington this summer.

The counties of Worth, Cerro Gordo and Floyd, in Iowa, will hold their convention at Nora Springs this week. The program shows that the interests of the convention, the themes for discussion and the activities of the cause of Christ in these counties have been placed in the hands of able speakers and managers, and there is every promise of an excellent and profitable convention.

The elegant church and parsonage at Warren, O., valued at $31,000, is now free from debt. At the tenth anniversary of the dedication of the church the last of the debt was paid, and the occasion was one of great rejoicing. At a reception given in honor of the occasion a fine program of music, speechmaking and literary exercises was rendered, the pastor, J. M. VanHorn, presiding. We are glad to hear of the freedom of this church from debt and its increased prospects for greater usefulness.

N. Rolla Davis, of Burlington Junction, Mo., reports 13 additions since his ministry began at that place. They are to have a county mass meeting the last week in July, including the fifth Lord's day, to be followed by a tent meeting. The Children's Day offering was $21.40, "the best for years." All the signs are encouraging and their growth is manifest.

A letter from Wallace Brockman informs us of the prosperous condition of the church at Jacksonville, Ill, Charles R. Scoville, of Chicago, has been secured to hold a protracted meeting for them in September. Their church enrollment of "ten or twelve hundred names" is to be rewritten with a brief biography added thereto. Louise Kelly was given the prayer-meeting hour for an address on "Christian Womanhood," which is said tc have been very fine. The Children's Day exercises resulted in $80. The pastor, Bro. Snively, is greeted with large audiences at each service.

Concerning the "Institute of St. John," held recentiy at Watseka, Ill., B. S. Ferrall, the pastor, says:

The great professions which the book makes for itself and the vast appreciation it claims is fully borne out in the treatment Bro. Hughes gives it. Tnis is shown by the hold it takes upon common-sense and cultured people. No other attempt to hold the attention of the intelligent people of our town has equaled it since my advent here. The rules and principles of interpretation laid down and the startling lessons relative to the future conditions of the world are destined, I think, to awaken a great and widespread interest.

On Thursday evening, June 15, 1899, at 7 o'clock, in the presence of many brethren and sisters from the other churches of the brotherhood, as well as a large concourse of people from the boroughs, the corner stone of the Bellevue Christian Church, Bellevue, Pa., was laid with appropriate ceremonies, the services being conducted by Joseph H. Craig, the energetic and devoted pastor of the church. A number of ministers, and also those from local churches, occupied the platform and assisted in the services. The opening invocation was offered by J. M. Sweeney, of the Bellevue Methodist Episcopal Church. Addresses were made by Bro. C. L. Thurgood, of the Central Christian Church, Pittsburgh; Bro. J. A. Jayne, of the Observatory Christian Church, Allegheny; Dr. C. E. Wilbur, editor of the Methodist Protestant publications; Bro. W. J. Lhamon, of the First Church, Allegheny, and Bro. T. E. Cramblet, of the East End Christian Church; after which a brief history of the church was read by Bro. J. G. Schmucker, recording secretary of the Bellevue Christian Church.

Payette, Idaho.

Evangelist Lawrence Wright closed a seven weeks' meeting here last Lord's day. Notwithstanding the many obstacles met, our congregation of a few members, brought together by Bro. Clay's and Bro. Pew's preaching last summer, was increased to a membership of 56, 23 of whom were baptized; several came from various other faiths.

Our band is substantially united, and by far the strongest religious working body in the community. The day Bro. Wright left a Christian Bible-school was organized with an enrollment of 76 members. A strong Ladies' Aid was also organized, and they are already doing very efficient work in securing funds to help house ourselves and furnish the necessaries to push our work. We have good prospects for getting a strong hold in Payette. Idaho is a good missionary field, and we hope something special may be done by Eastern brethren to es'ablish the cause of Christ here. If a good house could be built in Payette it would do much to promote the gospel in this country.

Realizing that much credit is due Bro. Wright for the kind of work he has done, we desire to express our thanks for his very efficient labor here, and to recommend him to any church desiring the pure gospel, presented in a plain, forcible, fearless manner, and yet in a Christlike spirit.

GEO. W. LEEK, et al.

More Church Debts Paid.

This week we succeeded in paying another thousand dollars on our church debt. In less than two years we have gotten rid of $9,000 of our indebtedness, on the greater part of which we were paying eight per cent. interest. Since Oct. 2nd 68 persons have been added to the congregation. Wednesday evening next we will have a thanksgiving service, to give thanks to God for what he has enabled us to do.

Our church property, as you know, is one of the most valuable in the brotherhood, and we hope to hold it free from debt before many years have passed.

Our people are full of the missionary spirit, but their hands are tied by the heavy burden pressing upon tnem. But you will hear from Broadway not very many days hence.

The Best Education.

The best education will train the hand, open the eye, quicken the ear and purify the fountain of thought. It will perfect the manners, give grace to life and unite the soul to God.

How to lead youth to seek this education is the most far-reaching question of to-day. Its right solution will be the mightiest force on earth to settle all social and political problems wisely and justly. When such an education becomes general there will be no war nor fear of war. Famine among one people will be an occasion for joyous Christian giving among another. Machinery and all national wealth will be used, not to amass fortunes for the few, but to lighten the labors, shorten the hours and bring blessings to the homes of the many.

Every youth, filled with enthusiasm to enter the combat against ignorance and sin, becomes a power to hasten these conditions. But all the high values of the athletics, of intellectual skill in mathematics, the fine balance of the classics, the subtle tests and close logic of metaphysics, will not, alone, bring youth into this noble citizenship and Christian manhood. Neither does this divine education have its crown and glory in the natural sciences.

Man may learn to make the sun his furnace to run the machinery of the world, make its heat-rays tap the ocean and answer the desert's call for water, but the fullest scientific knowledge and the highest intellectual attainments fail to answer man's call for the best education. Such attainments give strength and harmony of parts and are immeasurably valuable for the mind's full growth. But the education which God would have man receive must not only use these; it must go deeper and find its centers in the moral nature. It must fix the heart on that which is good. This is the focal point toward which all effort should be aimed. It is the central aim of every great teachers and constitutes the basis of individual worth. This education develops men who will bravely suffer and nobly do for the good of others. It alone can perpetuate our republic and enable it to give light and liberty to the world.

"The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth his handiwork;" but his loving-kindness and tender mercies which are to win and save mandkind can only be shown through the truly educated human heart. Any educational effort or plan or ystem, therefore, whose energy does not draw to this center lacks that element which makes all else valuable.

Education and Missions.

The connection between missions and education is becoming so well understood now, that we do not have to pause and explain why the American Christian Missionary Society should have a Board of Education as one of its branches. We are realizing more every day that while "Go preach" comes first in the missionary's marching orders, "Go teach" follows fast after it; and that whenever a church is built, a schoolhouse must soon go up beside it. And we are finding, also, that for the work to be well done and lasting, we must "send forth the best we breed," both as preachers and teachers. The idea that a man who was too untrained and uncultured to be a success at home could go and meet all the needs of foreign missionary work is an exploded one. A missionary of twenty-five years' experience in India told me that there were no keener and more logical minds in the world than those of the educated Hindus, and that missionaries must sooner or later come in contact with them, if not personally, at least with their arguments and influence. He was strongly of the opinion that we needed trained and educated men for mission work in India. I suppose the same is true of China and Japan.

While it is a fact that some of the apostles and first preachers were unlearned and ignorant men, yet they had the training of the greatest of all teachers—"they had been with Jesus." And we find that the one who carried the gospel to the heathen of his day, and whose labors were more abundantly blessed than those of any other, was Paul, the man of "much learning," wise with all that the best schools of his nation could teach him.

Would it not be well for us, as far as possible, to send forth as missionaries men and women, not only of unstained lives and lofty purposes, impelled by love for Christ and for those for whom Christ died, but also those have sat at the feet, not of Gamaliels of dry legalism, but of ripe scholars and Christians, and who are learned in all the best wisdom that the schools of America can teach them?

Some Things in Texas.

A recent short visit to Texas was a revelation to me. I had never been in that state before, and consequently was unprepared for much which I saw and heard.

Texas is really an empire within itself. It possesses possibilities which are beyond any other state in the union. It is doubtful whether a more beautiful and productive garden spot can be found on the earth than that which stretches from Denison to Austin. The contrast between the corn, cotton and wheat fields make a pleasing variety, and one does not tire of the scenery, although most of the land is very level and without woodlands.

I attended the state meeting at Ft. Worth. This was an interesting study to me. Some of the very questions which were discussed 30 years ago in Kentucky and Ohio were vigorously handled by the delegates. I noticed also another striking similarity to the old times of 30 years ago. When a question of parliamentary order was raised, everybody seemed to be ready to take a part in the discussion. However, even on such an exciting matter as parliamentary order the disputants evinced the greatest good humor, and throughout the whole convention the spirit of the proceedings was all that could be desired. I was impressed with the deep earnestness of the Texas brethren and I was also somewhat surprised at their progressive tendency. They have their difficulties to contend with, but they are thoroughly alive to the needs of the cause, and they are trying honestly and bravely to supply these needs.

My visit to Austin was delightfully pleasant. My home was with Bro. J. W. Lowber, who is doing a most excellent work in the capital city. The new church building which has been erected under his direction is a perfect gem of architecture. Indeed, I have seen no more beautiful church any where. It is certainly a marvel of cheapness, considering what has been secured for the investment.

Unless I am greatly mistaken it will not be many years before Texas will be the banner state among those where the Disciples' movement is making the greatest progress.

Kentucky Notes.

Bro. Jacob H. Fagaley, of the Mt. Olive congregation, in this county, was recently ordained to to the ministry by Bro. B. J. Pinkerton and the writer.

A few weeks ago the Stanford congregation rallied and paid off a debt of long standing, much of the credit for which is due to our good sisters, who did not stop with that, but have handsomely recarpeted the audience room.

We are now raising a fund to erect a monument over the grave of Bro. John Bell Gibson, who ministered to this congregation most acceptably for a number of years, and who died here while yet in the strength of young manhood.

Bro. Joseph Ballou, who years ago ministered to the congregation, and whose home is here, is a wise counselor and a most congenial companion as well as a vigorous thinker and speaker. He and his family hold a deservedly high place in the esteem of all.

I have never heard a finer baccalaureate sermon than was that of Pres. B. J. Pinkerton, of Hustonville, here on the 4th inst., to the graduating class of Stanford Female College.

The Danville Church, only ten miles distant, greatly mourns the loss of Bro. Kendrick, who faithfully ministered there for about eight years. Although several months in his grave, the Danville brethren continue his salary to his widow—a most beautiful and tender attestation of their love for them both.

Bro. David Hanna, an Australian student of the Bible College, Lexington, Ky., and preacher to several congregations in this county, died last week, after a short sickness of typhoid fever. He was a young man of fine promise.

I hope no Missouri preacher will forget or let his congregation forget "Educational Day in Missouri"—the first Lord's day in July. If the congregations will comply with the request of the Educational Convention, and give on an average $1.00 for each member, great and lasting good will be done.

God grant that the institutions so much in need of help and so worthy of it may not be disappointed in the outcome.

The congregation here kindly grants me a month's vacation. In a few days I hope to join my family, now at Columbia, Mo., and shall spend July visiting in various parts of the state. Hope to be able to call on the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in passing through St. Louis. Yours fraternally,

Money and Men.

No statement can be made with greater confidence than that the Bible teaches that the world and all things in it were made for man's use. The first chapter of Genesis makes this no less prominent than the fact that God created the world. To man was entrusted the dominion. This is writ large on every page of Scripture. When Jesus said that "the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath," he was not merely laying down a rule for Sabbath observance, but he was enunciating this same principle that all, things in nature and institutions, was to be held in subordination to human life. They are of value only as they contribute to man's need and to his upbuilding. The curse of this commercial age lies in the thought that the things that belong to man, money and social position and honors, are more important than man himself.

The only person whom Jesus called a fool was one who thought that property was to be hoarded instead of used. Because he had goods laid up to meet his own needs for many years, he thought that his obligations to the world were at an end. Jesus does not rebuke him for his dishonest practices in accumulating his wealth. It came in the most legitimate of all ways, the abundant yield of his farm. He might be the chairman of the board of deacons or the leading elder in a modern church, and the pastor would not think it necessary to pass the slightest censure upon him. Yet, to Jesus' way of thinking he was the typical fool. He was rebuked, not for his method of getting property, but for his method of distributing it, or rather because he did not distribute it. We have long preached the gospel of honesty in the accumulation of wealth; but we are just beginning to preach the gospel of honesty in administering it. Yet the one obligation is as imperative as the other, and probably receives even more emphasis in the Bible. The rule of the older economists, that a man is entitled to get all he can and hold all he gets, is opposed both to sound economics and to true religion. It directly contradicts the teaching of Jesus that the highest expression of life is found in service, and to the injuction that the strong are to bear the infirmities of the weak.

What, then, is the Biblical law for the acquisition and the holding of property? If I catch aright the teachings and the spirit of the Bible, it is simply this: all possessions are to be held subordinate to the interests of human life, and he who can administer property so as to serve best the cause of humanity is entitled to it. Not then in the ability to acquire, but in the ability to use, is found the right to the possession of property.

It is on these grounds that our colleges are confidently asking for financial support. They feel that they are doing a work that is absolutely essential, and that there are larger returns on the sums invested in the way of characters formed and lives built up than in almost any other field. This work cannot be done by private enterprise. It is a work for the public, and must be supported by the public. Because the colleges can do more for you and for the world with your money than you can do with it yourself, they ask for your support.

A. J. Marshall's "West End" Meeting.

It was an experiment. The church had never had a protracted meeting. Bro. Parsons preached a few evenings soon after our organization four years ago, but was called away by the serious illness of his father, and the meetings were discontinued. Bro. Marshall had never held a protracted meeting in St. Louis. The time of year was considered so unfavorable that none of our other churches were willing to undertake a meeting. There were an unusual number of outside attractions calculated to keep the people away from our services. The weather, most of the time, was extremely hot, and yet I feel that we had one of the best two weeks' meetings held in any of our churches since I came here eleven years ago. The attendance was from two to five times as large in proportion to our membership as I have ever seen in any protracted meeting in any of our St. Louis churches, and I have attended nearly all of them. Bro. Marshall preached only twelve sermons, and gave one talk to the children, and yet there were five excellent additions, with others certain to follow at an early day. There were two human reasons for our splendid success: first, the excellent gospel preached by Bro. Marshall, which in Christlike directness and evident sincerity I think I have never heard surpassed; and, secondly, the perfect unity, spirituality and fidelity of the splendid membership of the West End congregation, which certainly has no superior in these respects in this great city, all of which was manifest in the thoughtful attention, the earnest prayers and the soul-inspiring singing of the congregation.

The National Christian Orphans' Home—Its Present Needs.

Dear Brethren:—We have never yet made a special appeal to you and been wholly disappointed, and we come now with confidence that you will not turn a deaf ear to our statement of facts, and our earnest appeal for help to pay the expenses that have come upon us this summer.

Because of the scourge of sickness the Orphans' Home passed through in the spring, and acting under the advice of the city health commissioners, and a corps of some of the finest physicians of St. Louis, we are having the plumbing in the older part of the building changed to the latest and best improved kind. The outside wood-work showed decay from exposure to the weather, and needed both repairs and paint; then the inside must be kalsomined. All this, as you know, will require money. Here are the amounts we will have to pay: Plumbing, $880.00; Painting, $175.00; Roofing and wood-work repairs, $40.00, and kalsomining, $35.00. The street and alley are to be made this summer, too, and that will cost between seven and eight hundred dollars, making a total of about two thousand dollars; hence, brethren and sisters, we make this special appeal to you who have enough and to spare.

By the Year-Book of 1899 we find there are 157,300 Disciples in Missouri, 112,471 in Illinois, 55,953 in Iowa, and in Kansas 45,750. Our plan is to ask in Missouri that

5 of these Disciples give us $50 each—$250.
10 " " " " " 25 " 250.
20 " " " " " 10 " 250.

We ask that in Illinois

4 of these Disciples give us $50 each—$200.

16 " " " " " 10 " 160.

We ask that in Iowa

4 of these Disciples give us $25 each—$100.

20 " " " " " 5 " 100.

We ask that in Kansas

From all the other states we ask

4 Disciples to give us $25 each—$100.

Cannot this be done, brethren? Hear our cry and help us. May the Father of the orphan and Giver of all blessings bless you in the giving.

Below we give form of pledge. All amounts sent will be reported in the columns of this paper, also in the Orphan's Cry. Send pledges and money to Mrs. J. K. Hansbrough, Corresponding Secretary, 5018 Cabanne Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

Dedication.

On Lord's day, June 11, it was our privilege to be with the brethren at the Union Grove Church in Knox County, Ohio, and to preach the opening sermon and dedicate their new and beautiful house of worship. The day was an ideal one. More than 2,000 people were in attendance. The house cost $4,000. There was an indebtedness of $1,100 to provide for. We raised the the full amount. To Bro. Walker, the tireless pastor, is due great credit for the erection of this elegant house. Union Grove Church is an old, strong congregation. God bless them in the good work they are doing. L. L. The Seekers.

GRACE PEARL BRONAUGH.

A poet was seeking and toiling for truth,
He sought thro' the magical years of youth,
He followed her long,
He followed her wrong,
And found, at the last, things are not as they seem.
Then bitter indeed were the poet's tears.
He cried: "I have wasted the precious years,
It is not what I thought,
It is not what I sought—
The thing I have found is not truth, but a dream."

An artist was seeking both early and late
For Beauty, to make her his soul's true mate,
He found her, they say,
But she vanished away
And left him bereft both of purpose and trust.
Then bitter indeed was his inward strife.
He cried: "I have wasted the best of my life,
What profits the spoil?
Alas for my toil!
'Twas Beauty I sought and behold, it is dust."

A sinner was seeking for pardon and rest,
He aimed at the highest, he aimed at the best,
He prospered but ill,
Yet followed it still
Thro' earth to the grave where all sorrow doth cease.
He won neither riches nor favor nor fame;
He died—there are few who remember his name;
Then what was his gain?
After struggle and pain
The truth of the Spirit has filled him with peace.

He sought and he found what the poet had lost,
He found what the artist unheeding had tossed
Aside in disdain,
As too common and plain
For one who would aim to make beauty his goal.
"What beauty remains to be found?" men insist—
"What is there in life that we seem to have missed?"
Ah, the sinner was meek,
Yet he found all you seek
When the Beauty of Holiness entered his soul!

Cheerfulness.

L. E. CHRISTIAN.

It is the key to everybody's happiness, and "the happiest thing in life is doing good according to plan." Doing good to ourself as well as to others. You admire a lady or gentleman who can be young in looks, when they are old in years. How can such an event be brought about? Dr. James F. Clark, a cotemporary of Gladstone, when asked one day how he could keep up the strain of old age, said: "I never worry; I take all the sleep I need; I am always regular in my habits, and I maintain a cheerful disposition." In this the first and last of his life were founded on cheerfulness. Frances Willard tells us that "we must be good-natured as the sunshine," and we are advised to be cheerful.

It is preached from the pulpit, fulminated from the press and drawn from the lives and sayings of all successful characters. We admit that cheerfulness is the panacea for most of life's ills. You say that you can not sit down and call a certain amount of the essence of health and happiness at will, and I agree with you. Cheerfulness must grow, and it requires time. It must be cultivated; only the foolish expect something for nothing. Who are the cheerful? Those who endeavor to smile, to look pleasant, jolly or full of mirth? Ah, no! The funny man who made seven thousand laugh last night may be to-day seeking medical aid because he feels so melancholy—although he is blessed, because he was a blessing to a vast multitude last night. Cheerfulness consists of three distinct divisions. The lowest has its ups and downs, its tears and smiles; but "it holds the even tenor of its way, like a rope of gold amidst a rift of clouds, leading us ever upward and binding the soul of to-day with the God of to-morrow." In the middle course we will find some of the real sweetness of life, and the present budding graces of affection and mind.

The third class is happiness of peace and joy which is only found in the citadel of character, and with it the wise say we learn that disease is a sin and poverty is unnecessary; they also say, "Why not lighten your load and shorten your road? for it is as easy to laugh as to cry."

Longfellow says: "Behind the clouds the sun is shining," but if ever you intend to bask in the rays of the sun of cheerfnlness you will have to cultivate cheerfulness, and that not with a slack hand. The amount of cheerfulness you enjoy will be in proportion to the labor you put forth. Do not expect to be able to be successful in your cultivation of cheerfulness if you are careless of what you take into your system in shape of eatables, air and drinks. Properly prepared food, pure air and pure water and the right kind of food to suit your respective physical wants are three great essentials that must be considered. Excessive detrimental habits will have to be abandoned that are draining the mental, nervous, muscular and circulatory systems of the body. It is amazing what effects will be brought about if only one is temperate in all things. We ought to follow the apostle Paul's advice, "This one thing I do," when we intend to cultivate cheerfulness. Pure air is a deadly enemy to most all disease germs, therefore, with all your getting in the world get glame, and be sure to take it in through the passages intended by nature that you should take it in through and not via the mouth. If you are one who worries, then I have very little hope for you unless you abandon the habit. Worry and discouragement are two deadly enemies to cheerfulness, and they who become their slaves are hopeless cases. The poet on this subject exclaims that the way to be happy is—

"'Tis being and doing and having that make
All the pleasures and pains that men partake—
To be what God pleases, to do a man's best.
And to have a good heart, is the way to be blest."

Give the poet his due, but remember that the vital element to all cheerfulness is found in glame, which is the vital essence of all life. You may say there is not such a thing as glame and repeat Frances Willard's saying that "the curse of life is that men will insist that their theories are true and impose them on others." Don't condemn a thing till you have proven it false. Glame is a power that will destroy disease. Breathe it in; nothing is more free than it is. The whole question lies with you. Don't doubt, but prove it. Put forth the efforts and see for yourself if the results are not satisfactory. And, as a last sentence, "Cultivate cheerfulness and don't worry."

Wanted—More Daniels.

BY W. P. ROOT.

In a former article I referred to the almost universal use of tobacco by young men and the further fact that total abstinence is considered by most of them to be a "back number." Many things conspire to bring this about. Prominent buildings in our towns and cities blazen forth the virtues of some vile brand of tobacco (they are all vile). One large building, a picture of which is before me, praises the virtues of a stomach-tanning drink in letters, some of which are 87 feet high, and all of them over 60. Our magazines and newspapers show whole pages in praise of some intoxicant. Liquors are prescribed in receipts for pies, and they are mentioned on nearly all fashionable bills of fare. All of the forces of what is called society seem to condone the use of liquor and tobacco, while the press, as if by universal consent, seems to be silent in regard to the dangers of these things. A young man lately told me that his bride, a church member, desired him to smoke, as it is customary, "and no young man is thought anything of unless he does smoke, and drink enough wine to be decent and well-behaved." He admitted the justice of my protest, but confessed he was not a Daniel, and could not stand up for the right if fashion dictated otherwise.

Here we have it in a nutshell—the perfect willingness of men to be slaves to custom and bad habits rather than to live as near God's laws as an average dog does. This is not an isolated nor an extreme case, for I can match it with another one still worse. The error in this case is in supposing that real public opinion does uphold these practices. A light breeze may make the surface of a river seem to run up stream; but the volume of water, nevertheless, is always the other way. So with the seeming indorsement of society in reference to bad habits. No boy will be called for because he smokes at all or drinks moderately; but if he is known to be free from such habits and declares that he has a better use for his head, the odds in his favor are greatly enhanced. I feel that the church is greatly to be blamed for not teaching more plainly the results of rum and nicotine and licentiousness. I feel confident that, if the old practice of signing the temperance pledge were to be renewed, it would meet with no more favor in the church than out. The bibulous habits of at least two large Protestant denominations are proverbial; and in one of them, at least, total abstinence would be deemed contemptible because unfashionable; and in the other it would be laughed at. But the tendency with all is to find a ground where indulgence may be enjoyed (?) without danger of going over the falls.

Just after the above was written I noticed the following ina a Cleveland paper:

"Lima, O., April 27.—A big brewing company, of Cincinnati, has purchased the St Paul's Evangelical Lutheran Church property on Central Avenue and will transform the church into a cold-storage room to supply this part of the state."

While some may think that this is a step downward, I am inclined to think it is an improvement. We now know just what to depend on.

I can't help feeling at times that connection with a religious organization known as a "church" is regarded by the masses as a sort of fetich against misfortune in the next world, and that nothing more is required. The members are as indifferent to the true welfare of the cause they have espoused as if they had simply taken out an insurance policy. They fold it up and lay it away while the affairs of the company are in the hands of men of whom they know nothing. The denominations are to blame for this largely. With them the matter of members is paramount; and to retain those members a conciliatory policy is often necessary, at least in a negative way, by saying nothing about correct matters of belief or a consistent mode of life. "You pay your money and take your choice" is as true of religious doctrines as of clothes. What may be the result of all this after a few years? I believe it will end in practical infidelity, forging its own wares on the anvil of orthodoxy.

I was once visiting in a neighboring town and a certain woman, a Congregationalist, said she had a grest dislike for one of their members, as he agreed, for business purposes, to be a Congregationalist while his brothers in business would scrape in the ducats from the Methodists. They did so, but soon divided in business. I may be uncharitable, but I feel perfectly sure that ulterior considerations as base as that, perhaps innocently in many cases, constitute the warp and woof of church membership. Surely, Protestantism is a mongrel religion, as the editor has just said.

I am sometimes asked why I do not join in with the people when they have a revival. The truth is, these revivals remind me of the contortions of a dead animal under a galvanic battery — very lifelike, but no real life. They seem to confirm the very evils which make revivals necessary. The Salvation Army men have just been here, and by mere exhortation they had 34 "converts." I went one night, but the Bible on the pulpit was not once opened; not a verse was read from it; no terms of salvation from the book were made known. Come forward and kneel down and pray for the Holy Ghost was all that was said. Now, where is the Spirit promised before we confess Christ and are baptized? In fact, the subject of baptism would have been as much out of place there as the silver question. That is one reason why I do not feel at home in such places. Of course, such methods are good in the slums of large cities where common decency is largely an unknown factor to thousands; but why well-meaning and reasonably intelligent people should be attracted by such methods ismore than I can understand. I do not complain of the remedy, but of the sickness that has made the remedy necessary. What a comment on the pulpit that it has to delegate its particular function to such methods as beating a drum, and vehement and extravagant exhortations to men!

Well, what about the Daniels? We need them on every hand to show the people the right way. We need them to sift right from wrong. We need them to point to the old paths, wherein if a man walk he shall not stumble. We need them to teach people that religion is an inward principle, lifting us upward, and not a mystical influence in the air that is to be evoked by grotesque genuflexions and loud crying.

Result: Above are samples of "Soft Soap" or "Soap Paste" made with PEARLINE, and with two of the leading powders which are claimed to be "Same as" or "Good as" PEARLINE.

The bottle to the right contains a solid mass of pure, white "Soap Paste" or "Soft Soap," made with PEARLINE—thick enough to stand alone.

The bottle in the middle is one of "Same as" and contents is one-quarter poor, thin, mushy soap—balance (three-quarters) discolored water.

The bottle to the left is a poorer "Same as," and contains simply discolored water, with a sediment (not soapy) at bottom. The middle and left-hand bottles are fair samples of the many powders offered in place of PEARLINE. Try the experiment yourself—directions on back of each package.

Some powders are worthless, some inefficient, others dangerous. Pearline is the standard. The Millions of Packages of PEARLINE used each year proves

Pearline Best by Test

Note. The difference in price between Pearline and the most worthless Soap Powders is nominal. A year's supply would not equal the value of one ordinary garment ruined.

Spooks at an Ingersoll Lecture.

It happened in Brooklyn at the Columbian Theatre shortly before Washington's birthday of this year. Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll was lecturig on Satan, Spooks, Superstition, etc. Suddenly, just as the Colonel called upon Satan to explain some of his tricks, there was heard from around and under the stage deep noises, thumps, bangs, etc.

"Spooks!" shouted one man!

"Ghosts!" shouted another.

"The devil himself!" exclaimed some women.

Ingersoll braced up and went on, but the queer noises grew louder. It was plain that he was getting embarrassed.

"Is it a practical joke?" he inquired.

No one answered. Everybody was too frightened. Then arose a practical engineer, who saw steam oozing out from under the stage. "It's only the steam pipes," he exclaimed, whereat with the aid of ushers and others, the valves were shut off and the noises stopped. But there are still people in Brooklyn who believe they were let in to the secrets of another world that night.

The Song of Heaven.

An old English Methodist local preacher, Peter Mackenzie, preaching from the text, "And they sang a new song," said:

Yes, there will be singing in heaven, and when I get there I shall want to have David with his harp, and Peter and Paul, and other saints gather round for a song. And I will announce a hymn from the Wesleyan hymnal:

"Let us sing hymn number 749, 'My God, my Father, while I stray.' "

But some one will say, "That won't do. You are in heaven, Peter, there is no straying here."

And I will say: 'Yes, that is so. Let us sing number 651, 'Though waves and storms go o'er my head.' "

Another saint will say: "Peter, you are in heaven now; you forget that there are no storms here."

"Well, I will try again: Number 21, 'Come on, my partner in distress.' "

"Peter! Peter!" some one will say, "we will put you out unless you stop giving out inappropriate hymns;" and I will ask, "What shall we sing?" and they will say, "Sing the new song—the song of Moses and the Lamb."—The Church Choir.

The Ideal Man.

If I possessed the powers of Raphael and Angelo,
I would give the world a picture that would with glory glow—
'Twould be the "Man of Sorrows" as he stood in Judgment Hall;
The incarnation of goodness—the only Friend of all.

He, alone of all, achieved the glory of our nature,
The only Ideal Human—the friend of every creature.
Not a Jew, nor yet a Gentile, neither man nor woman,
Yet possessing the glory of both—this only perfect human.

In his face the fatherly look, gilded with motherly light,
With eyes of tenderest pity, looking on a world of night;
Calling long and tenderly and seeking the lost to save;
Friend of publicans and sinners, for whom his life he gave.

Prince of Peace, Herald of Hope, the Lord of law and love,
Whose life was one of sacrifice, sent from the world above;
Who loved the prodigal son, and the daughter just as well;
With a love so full of pity, greater than earth can tell.

Then I would show this picture to our erring, sinful race,
The unwilling skeptic—drunkard, strange woman—who by grace
Might receive from him the spirit of obedience and love,
That would make this world a heaven, just like the one above.

All hail the spirit of this life that flowed with love for all!
Repent and be converted! O, answer the welcome call!
Light and peace will be your portion, if you harken to his voice.
Oh, heed the call of Jesus—let salvation be your choice.

Come, all who dwell in darkness, in sorrow, woe and sin,
Give your obedience to this King. Come now and look and live.
Ecce Homo! Ecce Deus! My Lord, my God, I can,
I will, look upon this picture, and see the IDEAL MAN!

A Talk about Washington Irving.

BY MARY E. WARE.

Washington Irving was the most famous namesake that George Washington ever had. He was born at the close of the Revolutionary War. Everybody was praising Washington because he had gained freedom for this country. The mothers loved him so that they named their babies for him. One sweet little blue-eyed fellow in New York City was called Washington Irving.

New York was the capital of the United States when Washington became the President.

Mr. Irving took his little son to see the President one day and told the "father of his country" that the child was named for him. Washington smiled, and patted the six-year-old child on the head and said, "God bless you, my boy."

Washington Irving's father was born in Scotland. His mother was the granddaughter of an English preacher. His father was a deacon in the Presbyterian Church, and was very strict with his children.

Washington was full of fun and humor, and worried his father by his pranks. His mother loved him very tenderly, and often begged the father not to punish him for his mischief.

He did not like the strict rules of the Presbyterian Church, so he joined his mother's church, the Episcopalian.

He was so good-natured and kind-hearted that everybody loved him. Once the Indians near Lake Champlain went through the ceremony of exchanging names with him. After looking into his bright, smiling face they named him "Vormonte." This means "good to every one."

He was never a strong boy. He spent much of his time in wandering up and down the banks of the Hudson. He loved this beautiful river so dearly, and wrote so much about it in his books, that he made it as famous as the Rhine River. People will cross oceans and continents to see the Hudson, just because Washington Irving has told so much about its beauty.

He loved the Catskills, too. He used to climb the mountains for hours at a time. One of his favorite pastimes was to follow a little stream until he found its source. He would throw himself on the ground and lie nearly a half of a day watching the clouds and sunshine, the birds and the squirrels, and the streams and the flowers.

Some people called him lazy. Oh, no; he was filling his soul with God's beauty. In after years he filled his books with this beautiful spirit. We feel that beauty to-day when we read them.

He used to talk a great deal to the queer old Dutch farmers. He was delighted when they would tell him quaint stories. One day he made up a story about these people and called it "Rip Van Winkle." Perhaps you may have seen Joseph Jefferson play this legend upon the stage.

He collected a great many stories in a book and called it the "History of New York." He told the stories in such a life-like way, that many people believed that it was real history of New York, instead of "make-believe."

When he was a man he spent many years in Europe. Sir Walter Scott and Charles Dickens were two of his most beloved friends. After awhile he got homesick. He wrote to his friends that he longed to be in New York once more. He said, "There is a charm about that little spot of earth, that beautiful city, that has a perfect spell over my imagination. I thank God for having been born in so beautiful a place, and among such beautiful scenery."

When he returned he bought an old-fashioned house just above New York. It was in the village Tarrytown, on the beautiful Hudson. He called his home "Sunnyside." Here his two nieces kept house for him. He never married. He was engaged to marry a lovely young woman. She died when she was eighteen, just before the wedding.

In his library at "Sunnyside" he wrote many books. The two you would most like to read are the "Life of Columbus" and the "Life of Washington."

He died just before our Civil War. Washington Irving was a great man. As long as people read he will be loved for the joy and beauty that were in his soul. Great men make a great country.

LIFE SAVED BY SWAMP-ROOT.

The Wonderful New Discovery in Medical Science.

SAMPLE BOTTLE SENT FREE BY MAIL.

Swamp-Root, discovered by the eminent kidney and bladder specialist, is wonderfully successful in promptly curing kidney, bladder and uric acid troubles.

Some of the early symptoms of weak kidneys are pain or dull ache in the back, rheumatism, dizziness, headache, nervousness, catarrh of the bladder, gravel or calculi, bloating, sallow complexion, puffy or dark circles under the eyes, suppression of urine or compelled to pass water often day and night.

The mild and extraordinary effect of the famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. If you need a medicine you should have the best.

Sold by druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes. You may have a sample bottle of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root and a pamphlet that tells all about it, including many thousands of letters received from sufferers cured, both sent free by mail. Write Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., and please mention that you read this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

The Message of Peace.

In 1862 Mrs. Julia Ward Howe stirred the nation with her famous "Battle Hymn of the Republic." Thirty-seven years latter, at eighty years of age, Mrs. Howe throws the weight of her influence as strongly in favor of peace as in the former days she made it count for war. She has spoken publicly in Boston in behalf of universal peace, and now she addresses a still larger audience in the following poem printed here by the permission of the Sunday-school Times:

Bid the din of battle cease!
Fold the wings of fire!
Let your courage conquer peac—
Every gentle heart's desire.

Let the crimson flood retreat!
Blended in the arc of love,
Let the flags of nations meet;
Bind the raven, loose the dove.

At the altar that we raise
King and kaiser may bow down;
Warrior-knights above their bays
Wear the sacred olive crown.

Blinding passion is subdued.
Men discern their common birth,
God hath made of kindred blood
All the peoples of the earth.

High and holy are the gifts
He has lavished on the race—
Hope that quickens, prayer that lifts,
Honor's meed and beauty's grace.

As in Heaven's bright face we look
Let our kindling souls expand;
Let us pledge, on Nature's book,
Heart to heart, and hand to hand.

For the glory that we saw
In the battle-flag unfurled,
Let us read Christ's better law:
Fellowship for all the world!

Short sermons.

The longest sermon on record was by Isaac Barrow, a Puritan preacher of the seventeenth century, who once delivered a sermon in Westminster Abbey lasting three hours and a half; and the shortest sermon ever preached was perhaps the sermon which Dr. Whewell was fond of repeating from the text, "Man is born unto trouble as the sparks fly upward." The sermon occupied barely a minute in delivery. The following is a verbatim report:

"I shall divide the discourse into three heads: 1. Man's ingress into the world; 2. His progress through the world; 3. His egress out of the world.

"Firstly, his ingress into the world is naked and bare; secondly, his progress through the world is trouble and care; thirdly, his egress out of the world is nobody knows where.

"To conclude:

"If we live well here, we shall live well there; and I can tell you no more if I preach for a year."

Then he gave the benediction.

This sermon, however, is not as short as the famous charity sermon of Dean Swift. His text was: "He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord, and that which he hath given he will pay him again."

His sermon was:

"If you are satisfied with the security, down with the dust."—Christian Leader.

The Kings of England.

Those who have once learned this jingle, which gives the names of England's kings and queens since the Conquest, have, no doubt, found it very useful. We suggest to teachers especially the helpfulness of such aids to memory as this old rhyme:

First William the Norman, then William his son,
Henry, Stephen and Henry, then Richard and John;
Next, Henry the Third, Edwards, one, two and three;
And again after Richard, three Henrys we see,
Two Edwards, third Richard, if rightly I guess;
Two Henrys, Sixth Edward, Queen Mary, Queen Bess;
Then Jamie the Scotchman, then Charles whom they slew,
Yet received, after Cromwell, another Charles too.
Next, James the Second ascended the throne;
Then good Willian and Mary together came on,
Till Anne, Georges four, and fourth William all past;
God gave us Victoria—May she long be the last!

The Unexplored Regions of the World.

There is room enough for pioneer exploring work for years to come. Even the central plateau and the great mountain systems which dominate it afford an ample field for further research, which must be undertaken before they are adequately mapped. The mountain ranges on the east and northeast of Thibet, the magnificent river region which extends northward into the interior from the Indo-Chinese Peninsula, are little known. Much yet remains to be done in the region watered by the Oxus. The great central deserts, as Dr. Sven Hedin has shown, concealed beneath their sandy wastes the rich remains of ancient civilizations. Even the maps of Western Asia contain much hypothetical geography, and the Siberian Coast is still most inaccurately laid down. Southern and Central Arabia is almost unknown and the venturous explorer who succeeded in making his way in a bee-line from Aden to Muscat would perform a feat worthy of the highest recognition. Thus, notwithstanding all that has been accomplished during the century, the occupation of the explorer in Asia will not be gone for generations to come.—Harper's Magazine.

With The Children.

CONDUCTED BY

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS, PLATTSBURG, MO.

"The Sunbeam."

As they could not return to Mizzouryville that day, Mr. Weston took Mrs. Shaw to a hotel, where he brought her respectable clothes. These were furnished by the church members at the request of their preacher. Washington found that his mother's eyes were dim because she had no spectacles. They reached Mizzouryville the next morning. The Advance Society were at school, but they did not need any one to meet them, since the little cabins tood near the track. "Sakes alive!" exclaimed Wash, "there's smoke a-coming out of the chimbly. Wonder what that means?"

"Perhaps there is a fire in the stove," suggested Mr. Weston. They went to the back door, since only the rear room had been furnished. Miss Harriet and Mrs. Weston were within; the former was cooking on the coal stove, while Mrs. Weston was setting the table. When the door opened they started forward. They were surprised to see a white-haried woman with a peaceful face and a quaint pride and dignity, her attire scrupulously neat. Mr. Weston introduced them, and there was something so attractive about Mrs. Shaw that the other ladies were drawn to her. Miss Harriet said afterwards that she would never have thought that she could have kissed the robber's mother. While this was going on, Wash stood blinking his eyes and pretending to cough. The kindness of the visitors had overcome him. They put the little woman in the rocking-chair, and she silently took note of the many conveniences about her. The look on her face was beautiful. "Home, and my boy," she whispered.

"It's all through these people," said Wash, giving a gulp, "and George Weston. Mother, you'll have to know that boy. There's a feller for you! And if I don't keep straight after this, I'll go and beat my head against a rock!"

"Breakfast is ready now," said Mrs. Weston, "and we will go. But you haven't seen the front room. We will go out that way, and you must come with us." She put her arm about Mrs. Shaw and they went ahead. "The room's bare, said Wash, "but I'm a-going to fix her up soon's I kin." But when he had entered, he stopped amazed. There stood a counter, well supplied with crackers, cheese, hard-boiled ggs, and several boiled hams waiting to be made into sandwiches. In a corner stood a shining coffee-heater, with a spirit-lamp underneath. In the window was a row of red and white and brown sodapop (namely, strawberry, lemon and ginger); while outside could be seen a handsome sign, notifying the public that this was the place to get a HOT LUNCH. Mr. Weston had given orders to have all this done during his absence. Wash tried to thank Mr. Weston, and Mr. Weston tried to get away, looking red and flustered, as if he had done something to be ashamed of. "Nothing to thank me for," cried Mr. Weston, gruffly. "I just sell you these things on credit; I'll expect you to pay me back, yes, every cent! Come on, ladies—their breakfast will all get cold."

Wash led his mother back to the fire. "Here we are, Ma, just you and me," he said. "And here's victuals. Bless my soul if they ain't fried chicken! You see it? Git on your specs! There it is, leg, back, breast—every part in its respective place. And what's this here? Cream! Look at it Ma; it's yaller? Sakes alive! Them's the kind of people that makes you proud to be a man, so you can feel kin to 'em! Ma, I had tramped so long, I didn't think they was any good pints left in me. But these people show me that there was a little spark still in my heart and they roused it up into a light. I reckon most everybody has good in 'em. I wonder why people don't try to find the good? They spends their time—I've been in society, and I know—not a-hunting out the good that's nearly smothered up under a gineral rubbish, but a-running down their pardners what's about as good as theirselves."

At the end of the week, the first page of the Advance Society's monthly had been "set up." "Whenever a "stick" was filled, it was thoroughly soaked with water. Then when the type was drawn out and pushed in columns, it stuck together, and stood alone. When the two columns were "set up," an oblong iron border was placed around it, and blocks of wood were driven between the type and the border, till the border could be lifted up, and the type would raise with it. The process of fastening the type by the blocks was called "locking it up." The iron border, or rim, is called a "chase." When the "chase" had been fastened in the printing press, ink was rolled over the type by the "roller," and a "first impression" was taken upon paper cut in the right size. Different impressions were given to each member of the staff, that they might hunt for mistakes, or, in other words, "correct the proof." They had decided upon The Sunbeam for the name of the monthly. The following is the way the first column started out:

"YROTAꞖULVS.

"it is our purposs to condujz a monthly magizine, prima5ily in tye intrist oT Thq AdVA?ch sokiat&. thss Society it ezplaine$ im Anotqre collum. At present it is enough to say—(?$; these qage will de bevobeb tu Literarʃ skitcheS, surreil storiep, Hesterikal essass ɐlso other misselan-$quj matrrr."

In the privacy of her own room, Jennie Weston was chuckling over this mass of errors, and feeling a thrill of pleasure in running her pencil over the page (till it began to resemble a railroad map), when the doorbell rang. Jennie almost held her breath, hoping she could escape company. But presently there was a timid knock at her door. It was Tattie Marsh, who had not been to school that week. Jennie did not look very glad to see her visitor, and she put her pencil behind her ear as if she might need it in a minute or two. But when she noticed that Tattie looked quite cheerless, and that she drew near the stove as if very cold, Jennie softened. Since that first day Tattie had seen her father intoxicated, that franchized citizen had not seen a sober day. Mr. Marsh had been accustomed to take a drink twice a day in the gloomy recesses of a certain drugstore, but at the last election he had started upon a fearful downward path. One of the candidates—and all the candidates were highly respected and moral citizens—had engaged him to hand out liquor to prospective voters. Mr. Marsh had not only handed it out, but he had also strengthened his own patriotism. The candidate, who had caused perhaps fifty men to be made drunk that day, was defeated. The one who was elected had caused at least eighty to reel home to their families. Mr. Marsh had no money saved up, but he took all of his wife's, and treated "the boys." When this was gone, he took her wedding ring, while she slept, and pawned it.

"I will tell you why I have come," said Tattie, looking very red, and speaking very fast. "I want to borrow one of your old dresses. You were first to help me, you know, and I couldn't ask any one else. You see these rags? Mother had just saved up to buy me a dress—I had gone as long as I could—because she works so hard. Well, the money has been spent. Now she is sick. I do what I can. But, oh, if there was some way to make money." The two girls put their arms about each other. Both were crying.

"This won't help, though," said Jennie, clearing her throat. "Tattie, there must be something you can do. Sure enough—you draw splendidly. You must make an artist of yourself."

"Ah, yes," said Tattie. "But in the meantime? Think of the years of training, and the expense of schools and boarding—and I am so dreadfully young—but now, now, Jennie, this is the time to think of. I must earn a living for me and mother, at least until she is well again."

Jennie stared fixedly into the fire, and slowly shook her head. "But Tattie, haven't you thought of something?"

Tattie's face brightened. "Listen, dear: I will try to tell, although I don't know if I can say what I mean. You see there is no help, except from me and mother. No kinfolks, you understand, to do anything for us; and all the money is gone, and no wood to burn, to-morrow; and there is a trouble every day that you couldn't understand. So I thought, who can help us? And I thought, God. You know he says, He will take care of his own. Well, I believe it. But I am not one of his. That is why I want your dress, so I can go to church to-night, and join. Some think I am too young, but you know Christ blessed the children; won't he do it yet?"

That was the last night of the protracted meeting. Tattie Marsh was the only one in the two weeks who had made the confession. After the congregation was dismissed, Bro. Putt said, "We've had fine sermons, and a large attendance; and only one to join—that Marsh girl. Wonder why the meeting has been such a failure?"

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

HOSEA'S ENTREATY.*

With the beginning of the second half of the year we return to the Old Testament to study the closing period of the history of God's people under the old dispensation. The books in which we here study are Hosea, Daniel, Ezekiel, Nehemiah, Ezra Zechariah, Psalms, Esther, Proverbs, Isaiah and Malachi. This later history of the Jewish people is perhaps the most obscure, but it is one with which acquaintance is necessary to the understanding of those movements of thought which find expression in the days of Christ.

The Prophet Hosea lived during the reign of Jeroboam II. of Israel (781-740 B. C.) and of the kings who rapidly followed each other in the swiftly moving drama after this period of prosperity. Jeroboam was the most able king Israel had possessed since the days of Ahab. In his reign the Assyrian Empire was compelled to turn its attention eastward, leaving the coast lands unmolested. The king of Israel used this opportunity to extend again his limited dominions until he had pushed his borders far to the south or east (2 Kings 14: 23-29). The nation was prosperous, but indifferent to its highest moral obligations. The religion of the times was a mixture of Jehovah and nature worship, which took on the rites of Baal and Astoreth. This destructive cult produced its legitimate effect upon the people, and sapped the life of the nation until it had no strength to resist the disasters which came when the strong hand of Jeroboam was removed. The period following his death was one in which assassination and confusion prevailed. The story of the kings who followed him is tragic to a degree. Zecariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, Pekah and Hoshea ran their brief careers and completed the volume of Israel's decline and fall, ending in the year 721 B. C., when Samaria was destroyed by Sargon of Assyria.

Hosea himself came to his prophetic career through an experience which fitted him to be the representative of God to the nation. The tragic story of his own domestic sorrow is told in the first three chapters of his book, as he in later years looked back upon it and perceived in it a meaning which at first it did not hold for him. A young man apparently of the better class, he married a woman whom he subsequently learned was unfaithful to him. The sensitive and affectionate nature of the man was shocked and distressed by the shattering of his dream of happiness, and the growing certainty that the children born into his home were not his own. The tragedy deepened, until the faithless wife left Hosea's house to live with her lover. Sitting amid the ruins of his happiness, Hosea was able to understand as never before, and perhaps as no other man in Israel could, that love which God had bestowed on the nation, equally faithless and heartless in its infidelity. In such an experience as this the man was fitted to receive the call to prophetic activity. He began to preach to the nation the gospel of forgiveness and return. He spoke out of the fullness of his own broken heart, as he could not have spoken save for his experience. But his very preaching brought a lesson to himself. If God forgave the sinful nation, must he not also forgive his faithless wife? This experience, which first of all fitted him to become a prophet, was now completed by the work of prophetic inspiration in his own soul. He sought out the woman, now reduced to the condition of a slave, and bought her back for a slave's ransom to abide in quietness and discipline in his home, and perhaps merit at some future time the honor which once she had forfeited. It is this story which comes to us in later years, at a time when reflection upon the whole experience had convinced him that his was no ordinary career, but that the divine hand was in it all. Believing as he did, in company with all his nation, that all experiences, good and evil, were dispensations of the divine hand, Hosea perceived that it was the divine will that he should marry this unfaithful woman and thus come to understand the problem of the divine suffering which grew out of the faithlessness of Israel.

If we find it difficult to-day to believe that God deliberately set a prophet to do an unholy thing, it is because we have learned from Jesus a higher standard of moral life than that with which Hosea was acquainted, and are able to see that instead of commanding the prophet to proceed in a course which in itself could not have been other than immoral, the divine purpose rather made use of one peculiarly fitted through his sensitive nature, and by reason of his own tragic suffering, to proclaim the love of God to a suffering and lost people. In this fact lies the unique significance of Hosea's experience. God does not bring suffering upon his people, nor does he cause them to sin. But in the midst of sin and suffering it is his strength by which they are enabled to find redemption and hope. The whole book, from the fourth chapter to the close, is full of earnest pleadings of the prophet to the people to abandon their sins and return to God. He described the evil of the times with masterful skill, and he uses for the first time that significant word adultery—which finds such frequent use later on in describing idolatry and all other forms of faithlessness, the breaking of the most sacred vow that can be made by the soul. The book is full of passionate rebukes, earnest entreaties and confident hopes. The prophet varies from one mood to another, seemingly living over again his own tragedy in his unity of feeling with the suffering life of God. There are those experiences of his own troubled years, when hope and fear, joy and utter despair mingled in his passionate nature, wavering as the conduct of his wife gave him hope of better things or plunged him again into the misery of blighted affection.

Such are the considerations which enable us in some measure to understand this closing chapter of the book. It is thrown into the form of a dialogue or colloquy in which the prophet, the people and God are consecutive speakers. The prophet first appeals to the people to give up that sin which had ruined them, and return to the Lord, telling him the whole sad story of their lives, and promising to render no longer simply offerings of slain beasts, but rather of true devotion. They would no longer depend upon the armies of Assyria, nor upon the strength which came with the horses and chariots of Egypt. They would no longer put trust in those creations of their own hands which they misnamed gods, for Jehovah alone could help. God responds to this appeal. He will heal their infirmities and love them as before. His anger will cease. Upon the sinful and barren life of Israel he will be as dew, and that soil shall blossom into lilies and grow trees of righteousness like the trees of Lebanon. The people once more respond that they will have nothing more to do with idols. The Lord replies, "I have answered, and will satisfy him." But the people, conscious of their past failures, say: "We are like a green fir tree, we have produced no fruit." But once more the divine voice is heard saying, "With me is thy fruit found." The prophet closes with words of reflection. In obedience to God lies the secret of prosperity and power. No nation can be great that is not righteous. To forget God is to bring down upon oneself the curse of barrenness and death.

About Washing Compounds.

In calling the reader's attention to the Pearline advertisement on page 825 of this issue, let us quote the renowned Mrs. S. T. Rorer on the subject of Washing Compounds. The following is from Table Talk, Philadelphia, Pa.:

The art of washing has not progressed as rapidly as other household employments, and if the introduction of a good washing powder will in any way ameliorate the conditions of our domestics and make washing a pleasure, I should be glad to see such enter every house in the land. It is a well-known fact that two tablespoonsful of washing powder will do more good work in one hour than a strong woman and board in three. Many housekeepers object to these "quiet workers" on the plea that they rot the clothing. This is, of course, not true, unless you purchase cheap powders, and even then I doubt if the "everlasting" rubbing, which one can hear to the very top of the house, does not do by far greater injury.

TOPIC FOR JULY 9.

"A GOOD VACATION."

(Mark 6:7, 12, 13, 30-32.)

Vacations are important. We Americans need more of them than we ever take. "Frequent and short vacations" is a good prescription for longevity. The American people work too much, and all work and no play has made brother Jonathan a nervous boy. Other nations do not work so much as we. They most of them work from nine o'clock in the morning until four o'clock in the afternoon, and then they rest, play, sing, read, and grow. If we worked less, and had more vacations, it would be better for us.

Hence our topic is an important one. A vacation is something one should get the most possible out of, and do the most possible with. In a vacation, one should get new nerve force, fresh breath and breathing power, new gray matter for the brain, new power for the soul. One should drink deep, for a couple of days, a week or a month, as the case may be, of pure air, clear water, sunsets, moonlights and meditation. And not only in getting should the time be spent; there is giving to be done. The vacation time need not be a slice of life thrown into the surf. There are things to be imparted, too.

So, this matter of a vacation is a matter of responsibility. Beware what you do with your vacation. Many take the vacation as a time in which the tight strings of morality may be slacked a bit. Away from home, out of the usual environment of restraint, where no one will know, why may we not do as we please? Let's go in for a good time. Or one may fly to the other extreme and be so burdened with a sense of responsibility for making the most of his vacation as to destroy all rest in attempt to absorb too much. All sorts of summer schools and summer assemblies have done much for the world, but they must answer for many shattered nerves as well.

Certainly, a good way for Endeavorers to spend their vacation this year is to go to Detroit, to the great international convention. If you fear the whole thing may be too much for you, go for a few days or a few sessions, taste the inspiration of it and spend a few more days at some cool resort near by, meditating. The convention will leave some Endeavorers fagged out who try to take it all in. If you must take notes, let them be very brief. Do not try to hear every address that's made. Make up your mind that you will hear only one-fourth of all that is said, and then you'll not be disappointed when you hear friends say, "Did you hear this or that?" Make up your mind that of all you hear you will absorb only one-fourth, then you will not be disappointed when, on your return home, you cannot remember more than one sixteenth of all that was said in that great convention, if that much. Let it be for you indeed a "season of refreshing." It is only those whose work it is to make that convention, who should come out of it tired. Make of it a vacation indeed.

Hollins Institute, Virginia.

Hollins Institute, six miles from the city of Roanoke, is one of the educational institutions that have made Virginia famous in the field of learning. It was founded in 1842, and has steadily grown in capacity, scope and reputation. To-day it ranks with those schools for young women which command the entire confidence of parents. Since 1870 the school has grown too large to be limited to Virginia patronage, so that all parts of the Union are now represented by pupils. Besides the thorough educational work accomplished by means of ten courses from which the student chooses, the institute has unusual natural and acquired advantages. It is in the Valley of Virginia, a region possessing a climate unexcelled for healthfulness, and mineral springs of famous health-giving powers are on the grounds. There are 300 acres of land surrounding the buildings which are utilized for outdoor sports. The fifty-seventh session will begin Sept. 13, '99

THE C. E. READING COURSES.

[There are three courses: The Bible, Missions and the Disciples. The three handbooks for the first year are: "A Guide to Bible Study," "Handbook of Missions" and "Concerning the Disciples." The three handbooks for the second year are: "Life and Teachings of Jesus," "Missionary Fields and Forces of the Disciples" and "Sketches of our Pioneers." Three handbooks and the Bethany C. E. Bulletin, quarterly, sent to any address for one dollar. All orders should be addressed to the Bethany C. E. Company, 798 Republic St., Cleveland, O. Each course has a director: H. L. Willett is director of Bible study; W. J. Lhamon is director of studies in Missions; F. D. Power is director of studies Concerning the Disciples. This column is set apart to the use of these directors.]

The Christian Study of Other Religions.

By W. J. Lhamon, Director.

The study of religions as compared with one another has received much stimulus from missionary enterprise. Our contact with other peoples has compelled us to know their teachings, especially when we have gone to them with an offering of something that we esteem better. Not only Christian missionaries, but Christian scholars have engaged in the study of the great religions of the East, that they might know them and be just to them. A few (but probably none of the really great) students of these religions have been carried away with admiration for them, and have presumed to tell us that they are equal to or even superior to Christianity. Maxims of Confucius have been compared with those of Christ, and the mercy of Buddha with that of Jesus, implying the equality of these teachers with or even their superiority to Christ. In the minds of a few, mainly those calling themselves Theosophists, Hindu philosophy has usurped the place of Christian revelation.

There are a few severe tests of the value of religions that should be known and applied by the students of the Bethany Reading Courses, and they are suggested here, not only as an aid in the study of the last chapters of the handbook, but as a guide in all such studies.

1. A true religion must present to us a personal God; that is, one who thinks and loves and designs and executes. Pantheism deprives God of personality and exalts a substance or a principle to the supreme place. A principle or a substance cannot love me, or be my father or my friend. Here is where Hinduism falls short of Judaism and Christianity. All through the Old Testament this same Person is presented as our Father and our Friend, the One upon whom we are exhorted to cast our care because he cares for us.

2. A true religion must present to us a righteous God. Righteousness may be attributed to personality, but not to principles or substances, and therefore this follows logically upon the above. Pantheism can have no moral attributes. Nor can Polytheism. How can a stick or a stone, a cow, a monkey or a crocodile be called good? Are there any virtues in a vulture to be emulated, or in a dragon, or a snake, or a toad, or a tree?

All through the Old Testament God is presented as a righteous being, and all through the New Testament his righteousness is mingled with fatherliness, and Jesus, our sinless Brother, is his highest representative.

3. A true religion, presenting to us a holy God, must therefore give due recognition to our unholiness. It must enforce the sinfulness of sin, and present a way of escape. It must bring the sinful child back to the sinless Father. There must be in it atonement, some way of repentance, some assurance of forgiveness, some means of reconciliation between man and God. All this Christianity has, but the religions of the East have it not. Buddhism, Brahminism and Confucianism do not emphasize the sinfulness of sin, do not demand repentance and prayer, do not promise forgiveness and do not offer the hope of heaven. Confucianism is but a system of morals; Buddhism and Brahminism teach the doctrine of the Karma, or consequences, or fatalism, and with it reincarnation.

4. It has already been implied that a true religion must present to us not many gods, but one God, who is over all, and through all, and in all. The unity of God implies the oneness of the human race, or the brotherhood of man. This doctrine is not taught in Hinduism, for instance, and it is inimical to the castes of India and to the race prejudices of many lands. From the doctrine of the brotherhood of man there flow many corollaries, such as the Golden Rule, the substance of the Sermon on the Mount and the whole body of the teaching of Jesus, a body of altruistic teaching, in the main foreign to other religions.

5. A true religion must not leave us in doubt as to the future. It must not leave us with vague guess work as to a multitude of rebirths reaching through countless ages, and a final subsidence into infinite nothingness. It must say to us positively that death does not end all, that the spirit lives and loves and knows and acts, though the body falls away from it, and that there is prepared by a loving Savior a desirable home for the living spirit after the body has crumbled back to dust. All this we have, not alone in the promises of Jesus, but in the fact of his resurrection.

6. A true religion must bear the test of time and bring forth worthy fruits. It has been finely said, "Religions are to be judged, not by the men that make them, but by the men they make." Compare China, India, Thibet and Japan with Germany, England and America, and let the comparison, or rather the contrast, decide which is the more wholesome, Christianity or its Eastern rivals. The religion that works itself out into great civilizations, the exaltation of womanhood, the protection and education of childhood, charitable providence for the poor, the sick and the deficient; that defends the purity and integrity of the home, seeks the peace and stability of the state and inspires to international good will—the religion that does all this must be a good religion. The religion that fails must be deficient. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

SHORT.

Jas. W. Short was born near Louisville, Ky., Dec. 30, 1817, died in LeRoy, Kan., at 4:30 P. M., April 21, 1899, aged 81 years, three months and 21 days. In 1842 he moved to Illinois, where he married Savilla A. Harbert. He came to Kansas in 1855, where he lived till his death. He leaves a wife and seven children to mourn their loss. Jas. W. Short was a private of Co. H., 9th Kansas Cavalry, enlisting Sept. 7, 1861 and discharged July 27, 1864, and a member of the G. A. R. United with the Christian Church when about 15 years of age and has ever since been an active and faithful Christian. His kind words and good deeds will live on, though his face no more we see. Bro. J. T. Perrat, of Crandall, conducted the funeral service. J. S. ROWE.

SWEENEY.

Rev. E. G. Sweeney died in this city at 9 o'clock Tuesday night, May 23, at the advanced age of 92 years, having been born in 1807. Father Sweeney, as he was called, came of stalwart Scotch-Irish stock and stood among men a giant in physical and mental power. He came of a long-lived race, his father having attained the age of 100 years. Elder Sweeney began his ministerial work at about 21 years of age and was ordained as a Baptist minister. He, however, soon espoused the cause of reform or restoration begun by Alexander Campbell, Barton W. Stone, John T. Johnston and others and was a great power in that young but growing body of Christians.

He was once married, his wife having died many years ago, and was the father of nine children—four sons and five daughters. The sons, all ministers, are William G. Sweeney, of Dubuque, Ia., now dead; John Steele Sweeney, of this city; George W. Sweeney, of Oakland, Cal., and Z. T. Sweeney, of Columbus, Ind. His daughters, like the sons, are zealous Christian women.

Father Sweeney's life was an ideal, strong in body, inflexible of purpose, vigorous in intellect, trained to thoughtfulness and study, with lofty purposes and God controlled ambition he served his generation well and died in the glorious hope of the Christ to whose cause he had devoted his life and its rich endowments.

A mighty oak that defied the storms of nearly a century has fallen the and we bow our heads in the presence of his sacred ashes. He realized in his long life promises made by the great Father to his brave and righteous children.—Paris (Ky.) Reporter.

The funeral services were held May 25 at the Christian Church, Rev. J. T. Sharrard, Rev. R. Lin Cave, Prof. J. W. McGarvey, Prof. Robert Graham and Pres. C. L. Loos participating. S. W. S.

NOW READY.

H. W. Everest's new work, "The Science and Pedagogy of Ethics," is now ready for delivery. Prof. Everest's former work, "The Divine Demonstration," has been exceedingly popular and those who will take the opportunity to read his latest work will find the same manifestation of the author's scholarship in it as was shown in the former production. The subject is treated under these three heads: Theoretical Ethics, Practical Ethics and Pedagogical Ethics. The price is $1.50, postpaid.

"Aunt Maria's Saturday Talk Series" are just the books that should go into the hands of the young. They are short and true stories of the lives of kings, queens, presidents, generals, orators and statesmen. The series is composed of six books, each book is handsomely bound in cloth and the price is 50 cents per volume or $2.50 for the six volumes. Send 50 cents for one of the books, and when your child has read one it will want to know the contents of the others.

Several of the Sunday-school lessons for the third quarter are found in the book of Daniel. Those who want to understand Daniel will be greatly benefited by reading "The Exiled Prophet," by I. G. Encell. About 80 pages in the first of this book is devoted to an explanation of the prophecy of Daniel and was written by Dr. D. R. Dungan. This part of the book should be especially interesting to Sunday-school teachers and will prepare them to teach the lessons of the third quarter to much better advantage. The price of "The Exiled Prophet" is $1.25, postpaid.

"MEN OF YESTERDAY."

The Rev. T. W. Grafton, pastor of the Memorial Christian Church, Rock Island, lately published another biographical work, in line with his volume on Alexander Campbell, whose teachings bore fruit in the organization of the body of earnest worshipers known as the Disciples of Christ. In this new issue Mr. Grafton treats of Walter Scott, Barton W. Stone, John Smith, Isaac Errett, Barton W. Johnson and Otis A. Burgess, giving a life sketch of five or six chapters on each, and writing discriminatingly on the mental qualities which distinguished the different men and gave their labors originality and force. Mr. Grafton has a happy faculty of proceeding to the heart of his subject without prolixity or waste of space. He seeks that which illustrates the special character of a man's mission, and the lines of his life drape harmoniously about it. The story thus becomes an essay, sometimes an epic, and the reader feels that the work has been well done. The title is "Men of Yesterday, a Series of Character Sketches of Prominent Men Among the Disciples of Christ."—Rock Island Daily Union, Rock Island, Ill.

Jubilee Convention Notes.

Surely, the Year of Jubilee has come. If large numbers make you rejoice, your heart will be glad in October. Our largest mail came the past week, and was full of enthusiasm. Bro. J. A. Lord and the writer spent two hours on Monday with the four Cincinnati secretaries planning some convention work. They are all happy and hopeful—yes, enthusiastic, and ready for any work that will help the convention and raise a million dollars for missions.

Bro. C. C. Smith lately returned from an Eastern trip, and reports that Bro. S. T. Willis, of Brooklyn, expects to bring a car load from New York City, and has already secured half-fare. Chas. J. Tanner, of Akron, Ohio, expects a car load from that district. One is expected from Fort Wayne, and one from Angola, Ind. Bro. Rains, fresh from the state Sunday-school meeting in Missouri, tells us to expect at least one thousand from that state. I have a letter from Bro. W. H. McClain, excursion manager for Eastern Missouri, and the names of his committee and the plan of his work ensure us that he will find his half of them. He asks us now for hotel accommodations for three hundred. G. W. Muckley is excursion manager for the western half, and the two together have joined hands with all the West and will bring one immense train load here. It will pay you to send to Bro. Muckley for a sample copy of his paper, Business in Christianity, just to read his article on this excursion. Think of it! It starts at Pasadena, California, and ends at Central Church, Cincinnati, and keeps increasing all the way. Bro. M. has been considerate enough of his own interests to pledge the California delegation to feed the entire delegation on "twelve manner of fruits." Bro. Muckley, if you'll save us some fruit we'll let you taste our watermelons, since a brother in Oklahoma has promised to send one hundred for the preachers of the convention.

Prof. Chas. Young passed through the city to-day, after a trip through Virginia, where he has been working up the convention, and and promises that there shall be fifty from the vicinity of Charlottesville, Va.

Yes, brethren, they are coming from the North, South, East and West—coming to a sweet fellowship; coming to help and to be helped; coming to plan larger things for the kingdom of God. Will you be here? We are planning to give you a glad welcome. Bro. J. H. Green, of the assignment committee, is especially busy these days, planning to put you in the best homes in our city. Bro. J. S. Lawrence stands ready to do anything he can for you with the hotels. Large delegations who desire to keep their people close together, should write very soon, that we may do our best for them.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY:

JUBILEE CONVENTIONS

MISSIONARY SOCIETIES OF OUR CHURCHES

Cincinnati, O., October 13-20, 1899.

Address all communications to Geo. A. Miller, Sec., P. O. Box 304, Cincinnati, O.

Our first five thousand Bulletins of Information have already been called for, and another five thousand will be printed at once. If you want them to enclose in your letters, write to our secretary, Geo. A. Miller, P. O. Box 304, Cincinnati, Ohio, and tell him how many you can use, and you shall have them at once.

Who will be the first to make a canvass of his church, and write me how many are likely to come?

A. M. HARVUOT,
Chairman Jubilee Committee.
617 Richmond St., Cincinnati, Ohio.

One Thousand Delegates.

It is expected that at least one thousand delegates from Missouri will attend the Jubilee Convention, to be held in Cincinnati next October.

W. H. McClain, of St. Louis, president of our state committee, is pushing the work in his characteristic way. He has appointed local committees in a number of the principal towns throughout the state. During the Bible-school convention at Plattsburg, Bro. McClain banqueted a number of brethren at the Laclede Hotel. Among the number were W. F. Richardson, R. H. Waggener, T. A. Abbott, B. F. Clay, H. A. Denton, J. T. Ogle. It was unanimously decided that the Jubilee Convention is to be the greatest gathering so far in the history of our people.

Bro. McClain has in charge and will arrange the hotel headquarters for the Missouri delegation, also railroad transportation. Address him 1312-1316 Chemical Building, St. Louis, Mo. Bulletin No. 1 of the Cincinnati local committee is before us. They are making great arrangements for a great convention. Let us give them all they can do.

S. D. DUTCHER.

Another House Dedicated.

The chapel at Brainard, Iowa, was dedicated Lord's day, June 11th. W. B. Crewdson, of Corning, was master of ceremonies. Nearly $1,100 in cash and pledges was raised to meet the deficit. Large crowds greeted the speaker both morning and evening.

Much praise is due the citizens of Brainard for their liberality. Without the help of Bro. Joseph Patterson there would have been no congregation, much less a house in which to meet. May God bless and prosper them.
